Address.

MR. PRESIDENT, AND MY BRETHREN OF THE ASSOCIATION OF GRADUATES:

I respond to the call of my friend, the President, but not to make a formal speech. I will rather, with your permission, in a familiar and conversational way, recall some of the events of my cadet life. I first thought of committing the date of my joining the Academy to the honor of my fellow graduates as a secret, but as I have already answered when the roll of graduates of 1824 was called, I must out with it and acknowledge that it is sixty-one years, almost to a day, since my eye first rested on this lovely plain and these perpetual hills. I was landed in a yawl from the steamboat Chancellor Livingston, at 11 o'clock at night, and spent the first night in the Hotel Gridley, situated beyond the then limits of the post, but at a convenient distance from the old barracks.

James Monroe was President of the United States; Daniel D. Tompkins, Vice President; John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State; John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War; and William Wirt, Attorney General; Col. Thayer, Superintendent of the Academy; Major Worth, Commandant of Cadets; Captain Crozet, Professor of Engineering; Colonel Mansfield, Professor of Natural Philosophy, &c.; Charles Davies, Professor of Mathematics; Claudius Berard, Professor of French; T. Gimbrede, Professor of Drawing; Rev. T. Picton, Chaplain and Professor of Ethics, Geography, etc.; Mr. Cozzens, Steward of the Mess Hall, and Willis, the famous Kent Bugler, Master of the Band.

The army consisted of four regiments of artillery and six regiments of infantry. The arm of the infantry was the old-fashioned flint-lock musket, a weapon innocent of all injury done to an object one hundred yards off provided it was aimed at the object. The Mississippi was the frontier. When the Sixth Infantry went on the Yellowstone expedition, it was looked upon as the exploration of unknown territory, and attracted almost as much attention as an expedition to Central Africa would now.

The corps left the Point three times while I was a cadet. In 1820 they marched to Philadelphia; in 1821 to Boston; and 1822, when I was away on furlough, they went to Goshen to take part in the ceremonies of re-interring the bones of some Revolutionary heroes.

Sometime about the 1st of August, 1820, the whole corps (except the class on furlough), including the band, embarked on a North River sloop. There was not room on deck for the four companies; two companies occupied the hold and two the deck, who were to exchange places at regular intervals. I belonged to one of the ill-starred companies who were below decks. Our more fortunate comrades who were enjoying the breeze and the scenery on deck looked down upon us with contemptuous pity. They did not enjoy their triumph long; a heavy shower of rain fell and these late supercilious, but now humbled gentlemen, came tumbling down the hold without being invited, and without standing much on the order of their coming. In the night the sloop was struck by a squall in Haverstraw Bay, and was saved from capsizing by the promptness and presence of mind of Major Worth, as I understood the next morning, being at the time sound asleep on a soft plank in the little cabin of the sloop, in happy ignorance of the danger.

We reached Staten Island after a sail of about twenty-four hours and encamped in a stubble-field near the residence of Vice-President Daniel D. Tompkins. A day or two after we went by steamboat to New Brunswick, and marched from thence through Princeton and Trenton to Bristol, Pennsylvania. From Bristol we were conveyed by water to Frankford, and breakfasted near the arsenal. I had the sweet privilege, plebe as I was, of taking breakfast in company with the commandant, with Richard Bache, Esq., father of the late distinguished head of the coast survey, who joined the Academy the following year.

This march is called, in cadet traditionary lore, the march to Philadelphia. The fact is we scarcely entered the city. The yellow fever was in some parts of the city, and the Major avoided it as he would a Lazar House. We entered the city (if it could be called entering it), by Broad street, then an unpaved road, turned into Market street, passed over the old permanent bridge, and encamped on Mantua Heights. Any one who can remember the city as it was then can judge how little of it we saw. No one was allowed to leave camp, and woe to him who left it without leave. The good citizens of Philadelphia, who could not receive us in their city, entertained us at a very fine dinner near the camp. A military company very courteously guarded the camp during the dinner. While they were performing this duty a man on horseback, just drunk enough to be very independent and insolent, approached a sentinel's post and endeavored, after being ordered off, to cross it. The sentinel and the one next to him were equal to the emergency. In a very short time the offender, to the great amusement of us who were looking on, was hauled from his horse and was seen standing in the guard tent as meek as if his nose was bleeding.

The corps returned by way of Trenton, New Brunswick, Elizabethtown, Newark and New York in time to commence the academic duties of the year.

But one accident happened on this march which however, was not attended with a fatal result. Cadet Reynolds, the smallest man in the corps, who held the left without a rival, as we were going down the Delaware from Bristol to Frankford, seated himself in a small boat suspended from the stern of the steamboat, from which, somehow, (I don't know how), he was spilled into the river. Fortunately the boat was near the shore at the time and he was soon rescued. I have a recollection of seeing his pompon bobbing up and down in the water like the cork on a fisherman's line whose patience is rewarded by a glorious nibble.

About the same time of year in 1821, the corps left the Point in the night on board a steamboat for Albany, en route for Boston. The deck was our bed, blankets our covering and knapsacks our pillows. The luckless wight who sought a softer plank in some other quarter of the deck, and in his passage trod on a hand here and a toe there, was addressed in terms much more candid than polite.

We left Albany on a sultry August morning and made a forced march of twenty-eight miles to Lebanon Springs. We pitched our tents while a thunder storm was prevailing, and tent-pins were driven home by the light of friendly flashes of lightning. We remained there a day and then resumed the march for Springfield, where we remained a few days encamped near the United States armory. We left Springfield in the night. The general beat shortly after tattoo and the march was continued till morning. We breakfasted and rested till the cool hours of the evening and then resumed the march for a few miles further. We were hospitably entertained by the citizens of Worcester. I cannot recall the particulars of each day's march, and I do not remember anything that would interest you.

At last we reached and encamped on Dorchester Heights. We cleaned up for our entrance into Boston as we would for inspection. Boston was then a town. We were escorted into the town and welcomed by her "Select Men" while their "Ancient and Honorable Artillery" were firing a salute for us. Every cadet who was on this march must have the most lively and pleasant remembrance of the unbounded hospitality of the citizens of Boston, not only to the corps as a body but to its members individually. The very next day after our arrival a grand feast was given them in "The Odeon." I was unfortunately on guard this day; but the guard was not forgotten; baskets filled with the dainties of the feast were brought to the guard tents and full justice done to them. During our stay a magnificent entertainment was given by the military of Boston to the corps in Faneuil Hall. Cadets walking along the streets would be captured by the hospitable citizens and generously entertained. Some comrades and myself experienced a delightful captivity of this kind at the house of Major Melville, a venerable revolutionary officer, who talked to us like a father and treated us to delicious fruit grown in his own garden.

But the great event of this march, and one that will live in my memory till memory itself shall fail, was the visit of the corps to John Adams, the second President of the United States, at Quincy, eleven miles from Boston. We marched out one morning and took breakfast with him. Tea, coffee and chocolate, with bountiful accompaniments, were laid upon tables on the lawn at the side of his house, to which a march of eleven miles enabled us to do full justice. After breakfast we were massed on the lawn in front of his house and the venerable patriot stood before us. He made an address to us, and was sometimes prompted when his memory was at fault by a gentleman who stood behind him holding the manuscript in his hand. After the address each cadet had the honor—which he has never forgotten,—of taking him by the hand.

No site of the greatest battle that was ever fought, no ancient monument clustered round with the most interesting historical associations, no object in nature or art, could have awakened in me half the enthusiasm with which the sight of this venerable man inspired me. I touched the hand that had signed the declaration of independence. I heard the voice (now feeble from age) which had hurled the defiance of thirteen feeble colonies to one of the mightiest powers on the globe.

Sir Walter Scott tells us of an old Highlander whom he knew in his boyhood, who had had the honor of shaking hands with the Pretender. The loyal old Jacobin ever afterwards held the hand which his Prince had shaken too sacred to be touched by any one else. I have not followed the Highlander's example although my right hand received purer consecration than his.

The corps marched from Boston to New London, Connecticut, and from there returned to the Point by water.

Shortly after our return I was appointed first corporal. I have since held a commission under the broad seal of the United States, and several appointments, military and civil, under the broad seal of the State of Pennsylvania, but none of these gave me half the conceit of myself which this appointment of first corporal did. This conceit was very soon knocked out of me, when, on falling into ranks shortly after my appointment and planting myself on the right of the second corporal, four or five inches taller than myself, I was reminded by the said second corporal, in no very courteous terms, that we took our places according to size. So—as the school-boys say—I was “trapped down” below two or three corporals. And why is not a corporal an exalted rank? Will not Corporal Trim go down the ages in company with Cæsar and Bonaparte? Will not Bonapart himself be remembered as the “Le Petit Caporal”? Uncle Toby never called the corporal by his real name (Butler) unless he was angry at him, and I am sure my old friend Young—who I am sorry is not here, would think his old friends had ceased to love him if they addressed him in any other way than as Corporal Young.

And now, in closing, permit me to express the pleasure it has been to me to meet here old and cherished friends, (alas, how few they are,) and to make new ones. My only regret is that I did not join the Association at its organization. My sincere wish is that it may last as long as the Academy lasts. The old graduates are passing away; the ripened fruit is dropping from the tree; but may this Association be like that tree which bears on its boughs simultaneously the bud, the blossom, and the ripened fruit.

NECROLOGY.

The Secretary then read the Necrology of Graduates for the year ending June 9, 1881:

THEOPHILUS H. HOLMES.

No. 584. CLASS of 1829.

Died, June 20, 1880, at Fayetteville, N. C., aged 75.

THEOPHILUS H. HOLMES was born in North Carolina in 1804, and appointed a Cadet from the same State in 1825; graduated in 1829, and promoted Brevet, and full Second Lieutenant Seventh Infantry the same date; First Lieutenant, March 25, 1835; Captain, Dec. 9, 1838; Major Eighth Infantry, March 3, 1855; resigned April 22, 1861. He received the Brevet of Major for gallant conduct at Monterey. His early service was in Florida and Indian Territory, and then in the occupation of Texas and in the Mexican War. After the close of the war he served in Florida, Kansas and Texas. Resigning at the beginning of the late war he entered the military service of the Confederacy, attaining the rank of Lieutenant-General. For a short period he had command of the Confederate forces West of the Mississippi River, but never became very prominent as a commander. Of his career since the war the Association has no record.

Of Capt. Mauck's civil history, since he left the service, nothing is known by the Association. His place of residence was Crisfield, Maryland. He died of consumption, the same disease that caused the death of his brother, the late Major Clarence Mauck, 9th Cavalry.

PAUL O. HEBERT.

NO. 1017. CLASS OF 1840.

Died, August 29, 1880, at New Orleans, La., aged 62.

GOVERNOR PAUL O. HEBERT was born at Bayou Goula, in the Parish of Iberville, Louisiana, in 1818. His parents were among the earliest settlers of the Parish, and were of the best class of its Creole population. His father owned and cultivated for many years a sugar plantation, which, descending to the son, was for a large part of his life his home.

Hebert, in his youth, was an apt scholar, displaying a ready capacity for the acquisition of knowledge, especially in the exact sciences of mathematics and physics. This talent, aided by persevering and untiring application, enabled him to take the first honors of his class at the West Point Military Academy, from which he was graduated in 1840. Generals Wm. T. Sherman, George H. Thomas, Stewart Van Vleit, and Richard S. Ewell were his classmates. Appointed a Second Lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers, July 1, 1840, Hebert's first service was at the Military Academy, where he performed the duties of Assistant Professor of Engineering for about a year. Transferred thence to his native State, he became an assistant to Captain J. G. Barnard, then engaged in the construction of the defences on the approaches to New Orleans. Though stationed near his home, and engaged upon pleasant duties, other interests seem to have come up to induce his resignation from the army in the spring of 1845.

The New Orleans Democrat, noticing his death, says: "Resigning "this position (his commission in the U. S. army) in 1845, to look "after his plantation interests, and to respond to a demand of his "native State, then in great need of an able scientific engineer, he "accepted the position of Chief Engineer of Louisiana, in which "position he rendered great and valuable services to the State from "1845 to 1847. Hebert was especially conspicuous, during that "period for his sagacious and practical recommendations in regard to "cut-offs, the proper construction of levees, and the prevention of "crevasses," (referring to the Mississippi River.)

It seems, however, from the testimony of the above quoted journal, that his advice in regard to the paramount engineering problems of the river was not altogether followed, and that the lower plantations suffered from that neglect.

During the Mexican War Hebert was appointed—May 9th, 1847—Lieutenant-Colonel of one of the additional regiments of the regular army, the Fourteenth Infantry, commanded by Colonel Trousdale. His military education at West Point was an invaluable preparation for the duties of this important position in the way of organizing and training the regiment for actual warfare. It was his good fortune to reach Puebla in time to join the advance of General Scott's army into the Valley of Mexico, and to share in those memorable and successful conflicts around the City, at Contreras, Churubusco, Molino del Rey, Chapultepec, and upon the causeways Belen and San Cosme, which resulted in the capture of the Capital of the Nation, and in reality conquered the peace that followed. Hebert was brevetted for gallant and meritorious services at Chapultepec, and succeeded to the command of the regiment on the death of Colonel Trousdale, who was killed in battle.

The following summary of his public services, subsequent to his war record is taken from copies of the "Picayune" and the "Democrat," published in New Orleans the morning after his death.

"At the close of the Mexican War, Governor Hebert returned to "his plantation at Bayou Goula. In 1851 he was appointed Commissioner to France, and in 1852 served as a member of the convention to frame a new constitution for the State. In the same "year he was elected Governor of Louisiana as a 'Young Democrat,' "defeating Bordelou, the Whig candidate. He was sworn in as "Governor at his residence, Chief Justice Hyams and a joint committee of the House and Senate proceeding from Baton Rouge to "his plantation for that purpose, as he was supposed to be at the "point of death from typhoid fever. He held the office from January "1, 1853, to January 28, 1856."

"Hebert served through his term with credit and general favor. "After this public service he returned to his favorite occupation of "planter."

"During the Civil War Hebert was appointed by the State of "Louisiana as Colonel of Engineers, commanding the First Louisiana "Artillery. Subsequently he received the commission of Brigadier- "General in the Confederate service. Though not engaged in any "active service in the field, his great military and engineering knowl- "edge were of great benefit to the Confederacy and his native State."

"Since the war he has filled various positions in the State wherein "his engineering experience and intimate knowledge of the dynamics "of the Mississippi could be made available."

In July, 1874, he was appointed by President Grant to serve as a member of the Board of Commissioners "to investigate and report a "permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the "Mississippi River subject to inundation." The Commission sub- mitted its report in January, 1875.

Governor Hebert was prominent in early life, having been made Lieutenant-Colonel of a regular regiment of the United States army at the age of 29; a Commissioner to France when but 33 years old; a member of the convention to frame a new constitution for his State at 34; and when 35 years of age was Governor of Louisiana. His selection, while comparatively a young man, successively to positions so marked in the service of his native State, must have been very gratifying to him as evincing the measure of his appreciation by his fellow citizens; each succeeding appointment attesting their continued faith in his capacity and integrity.

For some years prior to his decease his health was bad, "requiring "a visit every summer to the Virginia mountains. His death is "mourned by a widow and a large family of children. His first wife "was Miss Vaughan, his second a daughter of our esteemed fellow "citizen, long one of our oldest and most successful planters, John "Andrews."

ALFRED T. A. TORBERT.

No. 1697. CLASS OF 1855

Drowned, Aug. 29, 1880, in wreck of Steamer Vera Cruz, off the coast of Florida, aged 47.

In 1855 there graduated from the United States Military Academy a class of thirty-four young officers, several of whom became Generals during the Rebellion. Of this class, Cyrus B. Comstock, so long a prominent officer on the staff of General Grant, and now a distinguished officer of United States Engineers, was the head. The Generals who served throughout the war were Godfrey Weitzel, David McM. Gregg, Alex. S. Webb, John W. Turner, Alfred T. A. Torbert, William W. Averill and William B. Hazen.

During the war, when the case of promotion to the position of Brigadier-General was a question of expediency, founded upon the knowledge of the talent, capacity, experience and worth of the officers to be promoted, and not upon the representatives of the politicians in the several States to secure to any individual the promotion which should always be the reward of active and prominent service, and that alone, it was no small compliment to be chosen, as were the seven from that class, to receive such high promotion.

Born in a slave State, but near enough to northern influence to appreciate the value of the educational facilities which were so easily afforded when education was deemed desirable, he seems to have prepared himself to enter West Point with comparative ease. Joining his class at that institution after the close of the encampment, he labored at first under the peculiar disadvantages which attend those who by chance have not been permitted to experience the associations and benefits of camp life, which does so much to give confidence to the new beginner in the West Point section room.

I was always a friend of Torbert at West Point, and I cannot recall an instance in which an act of his could in any way detract from the respect I had for his steady, honest, manly character. Always ready, but never pushing, were his main characteristics. He graduated with us, and was endeared to all of us as one we were to be proud of as a classmate.

I served with Torbert from the first day of his entrance into the army of the Potomac until his departure for the Shenandoah Valley.

He was especially good in giving enthusiasm to an infantry command. He was careful and painstaking to a sufficient degree to ensure to himself the respect and confidence of his men. The same characteristics were typical of him as when a Cadet. He is described by those most intimate with him at West Point as "a steady Cadet; not brilliant, not ostentatious, but naturally clear and with a sensible head."

When Torbert's brigade was directed to engage the enemy, no one expected to hear of its being defeated. His brigade was one of several which had won for themselves the reputation of being sure, steady and victorious. Its reputation was like that of the Second Corps, which was founded upon the words:—"This Corps has never lost a Gun nor a Color." A characteristic of that Corps up to the battle of Spottsylvania Court House, which proved to be a wonderful incentive to all who joined it; an invaluable assistant to the Generals who commanded in it.

In the discharge of his duty in the manner characteristic of the graduates of West Point, he necessarily attracted by industry and fidelity the attention of the authorities of New Jersey, and won their affection and regard. He overcame a prejudice which was founded upon the fact that he was a native of the South and probably a sympathizer with their conspiracy. This was the result of his constant, courageous and able denunciation of all those who took part in or who sustained the insurrection, then only in its incipiency. As regards strength to be aggressive or prestige sufficient to make clear to men who were even as far north as New Jersey, upon which side they should declare themselves, nothing had as yet been determined.

From the time of his appointment in 1861 to the regiment which was assigned to General Philip Kearney, in Franklin's Division, to the time of the end of his service with the infantry in the Army of the Potomac, Torbert served without loss in that high estimation in which he was held at the headquarters of that army.

The writer, who has witnessed nearly all the engagements of the Army of the Potomac, fails to recall any evidence of dissatisfaction with or want of confidence in Torbert from the beginning of his service to the close of his career with that army. The service that he could render in stations or assignments away from the point of main interest, would not naturally attract the attention of the future historian as much as will hereafter the characteristics which he displayed when serving in the main body as a part of the great machine upon whose success the whole country, East and West, were entirely dependent.

So many have recorded the military services of Torbert, that to repeat them here in detail seems to the writer an unnecessary reproduction of written evidence. His record forms a part of the history of the Rebellion. He served in the Army of the Potomac, against the insurgents, as Colonel of Infantry, as Brigadier General commanding a Brigade, and in the Cavalry as commanding a Division, and finally as Commander of the Cavalry under Sheridan, in the Army of the Shenandoah.

When the history of these battles and engagements is fully written, Torbert's name will always appear as that of one who bore a distinguished part in making the great name and reputation which the Army of the Potomac and its detached portions now enjoy among the great armies of the world.

Resigning from the army in 1866, Torbert lived at Milford, Del., where he had married his wife, formerly Miss Mary E. Curry, until the General Government appointed him Minister Plenipotentiary to San Salvador, in 1869. He was afterward transferred as Consul-General to Havana, and finally Consul-General at Paris. In every civil station to which he was appointed, he was found to be discreet, expeditious and effective in his action. He was loyal, in war, to his country, loyal to his commanding officers, loyal to the principles of the party he represented, and more than all, loyal and affectionate to his family. It was hard then, indeed, that Divine Providence should have ruled that General Torbert should have embarked, in August, 1880, on that unfortunate steamer, the City of Vera Cruz. He was now but 47 years of age. More than twenty-five years had elapsed since he left the Military Academy, and having done well throughout a long military career, and having added to his military honors a further honor of being called one of the best of American Consuls abroad, he was about to embark in a civil enterprise, being called to a position of judicial trust by his fellow citizens, who well knew to whom they should naturally entrust their pecuniary responsibilities abroad.

We all know the story of that shipwreck, and of the opportunity again afforded Torbert to show that under all circumstances he could be cheerful, resigned, and capable of doing good to others. His last attempt to save the young son of one of his companions was characteristic of a man who had braved death so repeatedly. Many were prompted, through this last act of Torbert, to make extraordinary efforts to be found grouped about the massive casket which held his remains in the Governor's Room in the City Hall of New York. The highest funeral honors were paid at every city through which his remains were borne; and at his home, where the remains of the gallant cavalryman were consigned to earth, and left in charge of the wife whom he so dearly loved, and to whose affection he had been so true, orators and poets vied with one-another in endeavoring to do justice to one who had achieved so high a national reputation.

HENRY P. WALKER.

No. 2540. CLASS OF 1874.

Died, Sept. 11, 1880, at Fort Pembina, Dak., aged 32.

HENRY P. WALKER, Lieutenant Seventeenth U. S. Infantry, was born in the State of New York. He entered the United States Military Academy in June, 1869. His ill health showed itself very soon after entering the Academy, and, looked at from our present standpoint, his conduct as a Cadet appears in an entirely different light to that in which it appeared to the members of the Corps of Cadets in his Cadet days. His frequent visits to the Cadet Hospital, and the facility with which he obtained permission to enter the hospital or be absent from drills and recitations, gave him an unenviable reputation in the Corps; and many a man now in the army may well question whether or not his severe criticisms upon Walker were well founded. His early demise would seem to indicate that his maladies as a Cadet were only too real to him. There is little doubt but that had his health been good he would have graduated with his class. Those who knew him will recall the fact that there were times when his energies flashed brilliantly forth for a time, only to fade as he succumbed again to disease. Notwithstanding his tendencies to shirk duty, as it was then regarded, Walker had many friends in his original class, and also in the class with which he graduated. He was a confirmed smoker, and never seemed better pleased than when surrounded by a few kindred lovers of the weed for a half-hour's smoke. He seldom deserted his friends, and had quick sympathies for any one in trouble, and very distinct ideas of personal rights. He was very fond of argument, and wasted much valuable time, as a Cadet, in pursuit of a worthy antagonist. Graduating in 1874, he served for a while at Grand River Agency; from thence he went to Standing Rock; after a term of service here he was sent to Fort Lincoln, and finally finished his career as an officer at Fort Pembina. During the summer of 1876 he served three months on General Terry's staff. His was one of the lives which lie under the shadow of disease, and lead us to ask what might have been had the life blood coursed healthfully through his veins. The writer believes that he did the best he could; we, as on-lookers, know but little about the struggles that may have taken place between an active will, an earnest desire to attend to every duty, and the ever present tendency to disease to which he succumbed at last. There is one special lesson that those who survive him, those who knew him as a cadet, ought to take to heart, and with this I close; it is this: That it is unwise to judge an officer's willingness to do duty by the frequency of his resorts to the sick report to avoid it; but in after years we may find that some one who deserved pity rather than censure has fallen under our adverse criticism.

ASA HOPKINS HOLGATE.

No. 2002. CLASS OF 1863.

Died, September 11, 1880, at New Orleans, La., aged 42.

ASA HOPKINS HOLGATE, of whose life the following is a brief sketch, was born in the State of New York, and at an early age removed with his parents to the town of Defiance, Ohio.

Before his appointment as a Cadet at West Point he had had a good common school education and practical experience in surveys of various kinds. He entered the Military Academy at West Point as Cadet, in July, 1859, and in June, 1863, graduated eighth in his class, and was commissioned First Lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers, U. S. Army, June 11th, 1863.

After graduation, being at once ordered to duty, he took part at the Dry Tortugas, Florida, where, for about a year, he was engaged in the construction of Fort Jefferson. In 1864 he was transferred to duty in the Military Division of West Mississippi, as Assistant Engineer, and subsequently became Chief Engineer of the Division, gaining the rank of Brevet Captain for meritorious services.

In the summer of 1865 he was assigned command of the Engineer Company and Depot at Washington, D. C., and superintended the closing of that important Depot and transfer of Company to Willets Point, New York Harbor. He was promoted Captain in 1866, and remained in command of the Company at Willets Point until 1868. From that time until 1874 he served as Assistant Engineer on various works of River and Harbor Improvement; in 1875 served for a time as Chief Engineer of the Military Department of Texas; was returned to duty at Willets Point, New York Harbor, and on December 9th, 1875, resigned his commission in the army and sought employment as a Civil Engineer.

In this capacity he went to New Orleans, Louisiana, in 1877, and was employed alternately on work of care and preservation of Forts Pike and Macomb, until 1879, when he was assigned to duty as Local Superintendent of Work for the Improvement of Bayou Lafourche, Louisiana.

Much broken in health, he fell a ready victim to exposure, which, resulting in acute congestion, terminated his life Sept. 11th, 1880. He was buried in the churchyard opposite Lockport.

He will be remembered as a quiet, genial, companionable man, of marked intelligence, and possessing many endearing qualities of heart and mind.

EDWARD DEERING MANSFIELD.

NO. 206. CLASS OF 1819.

Died, Oct. 27, 1880, at his country home, near Morrow, Ohio, aged 79 years.

EDWARD D. MANSFIELD was born at New Haven, Conn., August 17, 1801. His father was Colonel Jared Mansfield, one of the most scholarly men of his day. Col. Mansfield was educated at Yale College; was a Teacher of Mathematics, Navigation and the Classics, first at New Haven, Conn., and then at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Had written a volume of "Essays on Mathematics and Physics," quite original, and distinguishing him, at that time, as the first mathematician of his country; by some of his pupils from the Southern States, who had become prominent in public life—probably Mr. Baldwin, Senator from Georgia—he was brought to the notice of President Jefferson, who appointed him Captain of Engineers, for the very purpose of making him a Teacher at the proposed Academy at West Point. In 1803 President Jefferson appointed Captain Mansfield to a more responsible position. It was necessary to the correctness of our public surveys that the Meridian lines and the base lines, (which are co-ordinates), should be established with mathematical accuracy; for this purpose Captain Mansfield was appointed Surveyor-General of the North-West Territory; furnished with astronomical instruments, and, taking up his residence at Marietta, Ohio, proceeded to establish and perfect that beautiful system of surveys of the public lands, ever since employed by the Government. This appointment displaced Gen. Rufus Putnam, a most excellent and useful man—who was very popular also,—and was at first very unwelcome to the people. Jefferson was charged with making it on political and anti-religious grounds, but the truth is, it was made on purely scientific grounds, and for the public good, Gen. Putnam not being a scientific man—much less an astronomer—and Capt. Mansfield being the foremost mathematician and scholar of the day. After a residence of two years at Marietta, Capt. Mansfield, himself, being most of the time absent in Indiana Territory, the former removed to a place called Ludlow Station, five miles from Cincinnati, where the first observatory in the United States was established. Here, in the very heart of nature, and separated from society, the family lived for six years. Here was spent the morning of Edwards' life, and here was formed and developed his love of nature, which he cherished through all his life. His mother was Elizabeth Phipps, daughter of Capt. David Phipps, of New Haven, a noted mariner of the times. She, highly endowed by nature, and thoroughly educated, developed rare literary tastes, and was, in every respect, the worthy companion of her scholarly and distinguished husband. Before Edward was two years old she discerned his talents, and made it her life plan to give him the culture of which she saw he was so capable. The instruction of his father and mother was all he received till he was fourteen years of age, with the exception of two months' tuition in a rural school three miles from Cincinnati. His father, retaining his military bent, was recalled to West Point by President Jefferson in 1814, to re-commence his career as an instructor in the National Institution. In 1815, Edward was sent to an Episcopal Academy at Cheshire, Conn., where he remained but a short time, having been appointed to a Cadetship by President Jefferson, out of regard to his father. He completed the full course of the Academy, being graduated in July, 1818, at the age of 17 years and 10 months, the youngest man ever graduated at the Institution, with, perhaps, the exception of Gen. Brewerton, who was allowed to graduate one year before his class, at the age of 17 years and 9 months. Edward stood fourth in the class of 1819, and was commissioned in the Engineer Corps. Under the persuasion of his mother, he resigned his commission in the army, and his father tendered to the Government the whole cost of his military education. His mother desired him to go to Yale College, where his father was graduated, in order to complete his classical education, but on comparing the courses of study at Yale and at Princeton, New Jersey, he found he could save one year's time by entering the latter institution. He was graduated here with honors in the class of 1822. After spending some months in a course of private reading, principally of general literature and history, and in mingling in society at his father's home at West Point, where he met many distinguished men and women, he went to Litchfield, Connecticut, and pursued the thorough course at the celebrated Law School of Judge Reeves, finishing the course in 1825. Here he formed the acquaintance of Miss Mary Peck, whom he afterwards married. For a few months he taught a school on the Hudson, opposite to West Point. In 1825 he concluded to make his home at Cincinnati, somewhat against the wishes and plans of his parents, who judged that one so highly cultivated would hardly be appreciated in a pioneer State. He engaged in the practice of law at Cincinnati, forming a partnership with the late Gen. Ormsby M. Mitchell, and continued in the practice till 1835. At this time he was elected Professor of Constitutional Law and History in the Cincinnati College. Although carefully and thoroughly trained with the view of making the study and practice of the law a life occupation, his talents and tastes drew him in another direction.

He began literary work while ostensibly an attorney at law. His first book was written in connection with his friend, Benjamin Drake, and was entitled "Cincinnati in 1826." They took the entire census of the city themselves, and gathered all the statistics for their book, which was designed to stimulate emigration to the city. He pursued various branches of literary work during this period, contributing to the periodicals and making literary addresses. In 1834 he prepared for the press a work on the Constitution of the United States," at first entitled "The Political Grammar," but since "The Political Manual," which for more than forty years has been used as a text book in many schools. At this time he also prepared a book on "The Legal Rights of Women." From 1836 to 1852 he was editor and joint proprietor of the Chronicle and Atlas, during which time he wrote many able articles, and introduced to the public many young writers, who afterwards became celebrated, prominent among whom is Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe. Subsequently he edited the Railroad Record; later still, he was a contributor to the New York Times, edited by his friend, H. J. Raymond, in which he published a series of articles which attracted much attention, over the signature of "Veteran Observer." During the last twenty-five years of his life he was a regular contributor to the Cincinnati Gazette, and to several other papers, political, scientific, literary and religious.

As a writer he wielded a wide influence, and won a great and good name, contributing much to the public advancement in intelligence, morals and wealth. He labored more especially for the advancement of the educational interests of the country. He was one of the architects of the great free school system of Ohio, and in every movement pertaining to popular and liberal education, he was prominent. He accomplished much towards the material prosperity of the country. Although never engaged in commercial business of any kind, none understood the laws and conditions of trade and commerce better than he. He was especially active in planning, stimulating and promoting the building of railroads. This vast business owes much to the advocacy of his pen. For forty years he wrote and worked for a railroad to the south, and was permitted to witness the virtual accomplishment of his plan in the completion of the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, before his death. He was no less interested in general manufacturing, and did much to develop and encourage this great branch of business in the West.

He was a wise and zealous champion of the rights of the working classes; he did not seek to make them jealous of the class of capitalists, but advised the closer alliance of the two classes, as mutually dependent upon each other. He was early and always an advocate of the temperance reform, writing and lecturing to promote it. He lent his influence to any movement looking to the moral improvement of humanity. He was a simple and pure-hearted believer in the Christian religion; he was thoroughly evangelical in his belief and exemplary in his life. He was a zealous adherent of the church; although reared as an Episcopalian, the faith of his mother, in 1833 he united with the Second Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, under the ministry of Dr. Lyman Beecher, whom he did not hesitate to pronounce the ablest and most eloquent Minister of the Gospel he ever heard. He was liberal and charitable in his views, and ready to affiliate with all who came in earnest to do good. For twenty-five years preceding his death, he was a ruling Elder of the church at Morrow, Ohio, of which he was one of the founders, and one of the chief supporters during his life. In politics he was first a Whig, believing most cordially the distinctive principles of that great party; afterwards he was a Republican, claiming that party as the legitimate successor of the Whig party, and the inheritor of its great political and constitutional principles. He opposed the extension of slavery, and when the war came, advocated its destruction.

His patriotism was genuine and deep, imbibed early in life from the sentiments of his mother, strengthened by the associations of his youth, fostered by his education and training, and fired by the stirring political movements and events in which he participated. He closely studied all political questions, and advocated what he felt to be right, and for the country's good. During the late war he kept himself accurately informed concerning the military movements and operations. He was uniformly hopeful of National success, even in the darkest days, and did much by his cheerful articles to maintain the spirit of the people during the great struggle.

He was little in public life. For ten years—from 1858 to 1868—he was Commissioner of Statistics of Ohio, being first appointed to the office by his friend, Mr. Salmon P. Chase, then Governor of the State. He never asked any office for himself, always considering the “post of honor to be the private station.”

His statistical articles attracted wide attention, not only in this country, but also in Europe. He was elected an honorary member of the “French Society of Universal Statistics.” In 1854 he was honored by the title of Doctor of Laws, by the Marietta College.

In person, Mr. Mansfield was tall, erect and muscular; he had a broad, high forehead, a prominent Roman nose, full lips, florid complexion, and little beard. His face was striking and attractive; he had great powers of endurance, and was capable of continuous and protracted work. His manuscript articles cover more than 200,000 folio pages. His books, carefully prepared for the press and published, number ten volumes; his published addresses and pamphlets more than a score; while his articles in the periodicals are numbered by the hundred. He wielded a prolific and a powerful pen.

In disposition he was sanguine, cheerful, amiable and kind; in manners he was dignified, courteous and approachable; he was a good talker; he was fond of anecdote and full of humor; he kept himself young and surrounded himself with young people, who honored him and loved him. He shone brightest in his own home where the benediction of his domestic and social virtues was richly bestowed. To be his guest was to witness and enjoy a hospitality at once most cordial and elegant. Mr. Mansfield had a singular and most profound respect for woman. His mother with her great powers and brilliancy improved and moulded and inspired him. His only sister, now Mrs. Professor Davis, in youth his sole playmate, in riper years still sharing his sympathy and aims—by her domestic excellencies, by her dignified, quiet yet cordial manners—by her broad and solid intellectual attainments, and by her sincere and deep and unostentatious piety, inspired his admiration and held his heart. Of his first wife, Miss Mary Peck, with her beauty of person, sweetness of temper, gentleness of manner, and native refinement and culture, it may be truly said, no fairer flower ever bloomed in the gardens of the refined and distinguished society of Connecticut. In Miss Margaret Worthington, his second wife, great in mind and in soul, warm and tender in heart, of most queenly grace in the social circle, and in her domestic management a creator and conservator of order, harmony, beauty and loveliness, he found both greatness and goodness; and after their mother's death, for a period of seventeen years, his daughters, each in turn, according to age, presiding over the home, having inherited generous notions and elevated tastes, and trained in the best schools of social culture, and having developed solid Christian characters, and loyally honoring, and most cordially respecting, and deeply loving their father, continued to exemplify before him the crowning virtues of a Christian womanhood. Associated with such a class of women, he was held by the strongest sentiments in a high regard for the sex.

West Point had no more loyal son than Edward D. Mansfield. Although in his literary course a graduate of another institution, which he highly honored, he never failed to give great credit to the instruction and discipline he received at the Military Academy. He advocated its claims before the country, and sought to have it perfected in all its departments. The best historical account of the founding and development of the Academy is from his pen, in an article written in 1863, and printed in the American Journal of Education, of March, of that year. In 1850 he delivered the address at the anniversary, which was reported by his life-long friend, Henry J. Raymond.

Although not bearing any of the honors of army rank, it will doubtless be found by the careful student of results, that his contributions to the public good are not out-measured by those of the illustrious sons of his Alma Mater. He leaves two sons in the public service, Charles D., a Paymaster for the past seventeen years in the Navy, and Francis W., First Lieutenant Eleventh Infantry, now at Fort Custer, Montana Territory.

Singularly useful, genuinely modest, untiringly industrious, he devoted his great powers to God and his fellow-men.

He was widely known and greatly honored. Perhaps no one in private life was more so. His good name, which was never assailed, he leaves as a rich legacy to his descendants.

“Statesman, yet friend to truth; of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honor clear,
Who broke no promise, served no private end,
Who gained no title, and who lost no friend.”

GEORGE B. CRITTENDEN.

No. 687. CLASS OF 1832.

Died, Nov. 27, 1880, at Danville, Ky., aged 69.

GEORGE B. CRITTENDEN was born in March, 1812, in Kentucky; appointed a cadet from the same State, July 1, 1828; graduated July 1, 1832, and promoted Brevet Second Lieutenant Fourth Infantry. Served in the Black Hawk expedition, 1832, and in Georgia and Alabama to April 30, 1833, when he resigned. Was a lawyer in Kentucky from 1833 to 1846.

At the breaking out of the war between Texas and Mexico he became an officer of the Texan army; was captured and taken to the city of Mexico a prisoner. While a prisoner the Mexican authorities ordered a number of prisoners to be shot, in retaliation for some Mexicans shot by the Texans. A number of beans, equal to the number of prisoners, with as many black beans as the number to be executed, were placed in a box. Whoever drew a black bean had to die. Crittenden drew a white bean. One of his intimate friends, a man of family, was also to draw; Crittenden gave him his white bean and took his chances in another draw, which, fortunately, resulted in his getting another white bean. After remaining a prisoner about a year he was released.

He was appointed Captain Mounted Rifles May 27, 1846, Major Mounted Rifles April 15, 1848 and Lieutenant-Colonel December 30, 1856. He served in Mexico, and received the Brevet of Major for gallant conduct in several battles. He next served on frontier duty in Texas, New Mexico, Nebraska and Washington Territory; was in arrest from 1849 to 1851. He resigned in June, 1861, and joined the Confederate forces, and was appointed a Major-General. At the battle of Mill Spring, Ky., he was in command of the Confederates after the death of Gen. Zollicoffer. The Confederates were badly beaten by the Union army under Gen. Thomas. The conduct of Gen. Crittenden was severely criticised by his superiors, and he never obtained any command.

Since the close of the war the deceased resided most of the time in Frankfort, Ky. He was a brother of Gen. Crittenden, Colonel U. S. A., late of the Seventeenth Infantry.

ARCHIE GIBSON.

No. 2784. CLASS OF 1879.

Died, Jan. 26, 1881, at St. Louis, Mo., aged 25.

ARCHIE GIBSON was born in Missouri in 1855, and appointed a Cadet from the same State July 1, 1875. He graduated June 13, 1879, and was assigned to the Seventh Cavalry as Second Lieutenant of Company "A." He joined his regiment in March, 1880, serving in garrison until June, 1880; in the field from June to the end of September, 1880, and on sick leave of absence until his death. He was on sick leave from his graduation to March, 1880. His service with the regiment was only six months, nearly four of them being in the field.

While a Cadet, Mr. Gibson suffered severely at times from an abscess of the ear, which was the cause of his early death. He was very popular with the officers of his regiment, and his loss was sincerely regretted by his comrades.

JOHN LOVE.

No. 1072. CLASS of 1841.

Died, January 29, 1881, at Indianapolis. Indiana, aged 61.

JOHN LOVE was born January 9, 1820, in Culpepper County, Virginia. His father, Richard H. Love, was of Welsh descent, and belonged to a family of note and influence in Fairfax County, Virginia. On his mother's side he descended from the illustrious family of Lee, his maternal great-grand-sires having been Philip Ludwell Lee, of Stratford, England, and Richard Henry Lee of Virginia. The latter, a patriot of the Revolution, and a signer of the Declaration of Independence, whose grand-daughter, Eliza Matilda Lee, became the wife of Richard H. Love, and the mother of the deceased. Mrs. Love was endowed by nature with a fine intellect, cultivated to a rare degree, in the accomplishments of the period, and was conspicuous during the War of the Rebellion, for her patriotic devotion to the cause of the Union.

Of her children, Richard died in the service of the United States Navy, in 1855; one daughter married Major Lewis Armistead, of the United States Army; and the other, the Rev. William Johnson, Episcopal Clergyman, of Lebanon, Missouri; and her son John, after graduating at the Military Academy at West Point, was appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant in the First Dragoons, in July, 1841. His military record shows, that after a short service at the Cavalry School of Practice, at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, he was assigned to frontier duty, and from 1842 to 1845 was stationed at Fort Gibson, Fort Scott and Fort Leavenworth, participating in an expedition to the South Pass of the Rocky Mountains. After a short time spent in the recruiting service, he was promoted to First Lieutenant, and was engaged in the assault of Santa Cruz de los Rosales, during the war with Mexico, and was Brevetted Captain in 1848, for gallant and meritorious conduct in that engagement. From that time until 1853 he was on duty at Fort Leavenworth and Jefferson Barracks, when he resigned his commission. Having married, in 1849, a daughter of the Hon. O. H. Smith, of Indianapolis, a distinguished Lawyer and Senator in Congress, he engaged in the railroad enterprises of the day, for which his education and taste had prepared him for success.

At the beginning of the War of the Rebellion, he promptly took the side of the Government, and was called into the field with the First Brigade of Indiana Volunteers, as Chief of Staff, with the rank of Major, to Brigadier-General Morris, and rendered efficient service, in the engagements of that Brigade, with the Confederate forces at Phillippi, Laurel Hill, and Carrick's Ford. The term of service of these troops having expired, Major Love was appointed to the command of the Camp of Instruction for Indiana Volunteers, at Indianapolis, with the commission of Major-General from the State. At the siege of Cincinnati, in 1862, by Confederate troops, he took charge of a Division of Indiana volunteers, in defense of that city, and subsequently commanded the force in pursuit of the John Morgan raiders, through Indiana, repulsing them at Vernon.

After the war was over, General Love returned to civil life, and was mainly instrumental in the formation of the Gatlin Gun Company, trading extensively in Europe, and successfully introducing that efficient weapon in England, Russia and elsewhere. During the last three years of his life he served as one of the Board of State House Commissioners, appointed by the Governor of Indiana to superintend the erection of the new Capitol building of the State, a position in which he displayed marked ability, his previous education and varied practical knowledge, admirably fitting him for the duty. The Board of State House Commissioners, as a tribute of respect to his memory, have recorded in their proceedings, that "in the death of General Love, they have lost an intelligent and faithful co-worker in official duties, an honest fellow-citizen, and an esteemed friend, whose unblemished character and purity of life are an invaluable legacy to posterity.

General Love was widely known and highly esteemed. Genial and courteous, his death was sincerely mourned by all who knew him. For many years he had been Vestryman, and an exemplary member of Christ Church, Indianapolis. Walking before the world in Christian faith, he died peacefully, in full assurance of a blessed immortality beyond the grave.

FRANKLIN E. HUNT.

No. 560. CLASS OF 1829.

Died, February 2, 1881, at Leavenworth, Kansas, aged 72.

The country has lost another of its long-trying, honest and faithful army servants, and all who knew him unite in honoring his name. LIEUTENANT-COLONEL FRANKLIN E. HUNT, Deputy Paymaster-General, died at Leavenworth, Kansas, on the 2nd of February, 1881, after a service in the army of over forty-five years. He was born in New Jersey, and appointed from that State a Cadet at the United States Military Academy on July 1st, 1824, and graduated July 1, 1829, when he was appointed a Brevet Second Lieutenant, Fourth Artillery, and promoted to Second Lieutenant same date. He was promoted to first Lieutenant August 15, 1836, and Captain, June 18, 1846, in the same regiment, up to which time his services were mainly with his regiment, except during a period of some two years, that he was detached on engineering duty on the Cumberland Road. In the early part of 1855 he was in command of Fort Leavenworth, at which time negotiations were in progress for the sale of part of the post reservation, the interests of the Government being placed in his hands; and for his indignant spurning of large pecuniary temptations to betray his trust, he received—unsolicited—from the Secretary of War, Mr. Davis, the appointment of Paymaster in the Army, in which department he remained, a great part of the time at Fort Leavenworth, until he was retired, June 7th, 1879, having served over forty-five years, and being over sixty-two years of age. He was Brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel U. S. A., March 13, 1865, for "faithful and meritorious services during the war." As a Paymaster he was distinguished for his sterling integrity, and devotion to his responsible duties, and by his death the Department has lost one of its most reliable members.

CHARLES STEWART HEINTZELMAN.

No. 2171. CLASS OF 1867.

Died, Feb. 27, 1881, at Washington, D. C., aged 35.

CAPTAIN CHARLES STEWART HEINTZELMAN, son of the late Major-General S. P. Heintzelman, was born in Michigan in January, 1846, and died at Washington, D. C., February 27, 1881, in the thirty-fifth year of his age. He entered the Military Academy July 1st, 1863; was graduated June 17th, 1867, and appointed Second Lieutenant, Third Artillery. He was promoted 1st Lieutenant April 20, 1870, and appointed Captain and Assistant Quarter-Master May 29, 1876.

Those who knew him soon learned to appreciate his stability of character, uprightness and courage; while to his intimate friends he revealed a gentleness, a sweetness of disposition, and a warmth of manner which were all the more pleasing from their contrast with his sterner virtues. His literary attainments, joined to quick powers of observation and a ready wit, made him the most delightful of companions. He had a high ambition, unmarred by petty or envious sentiments. His devotion to duty for duty's sake, caused his untimely death. In the early stages of the disease, which has resulted fatally, he was urged in vain to give up work and seek a more congenial climate. It was only when overpowered by illness, that he consented to make the change, which, if undertaken earlier, would most probably have greatly prolonged his life.

His friends have lost in him one whose memory they will ever tenderly cherish. The Academy, to which he was attached, has gained a bright accession to that roll of her sons who have honestly and earnestly done their duty, not for the sake of gain, but because their path was pointed out and they followed it, according to her daily teaching, even unto death. CHARLES T. BAKER.

No. 1160. CLASS OF 1842.

Died, Feb. 28th, 1881, at New York, N. Y., aged 60.

CHARLES T. BAKER, the son of Colonel Rufus L. Baker, of the Ordnance Corps, was born on the 13th of April, 1821. He was appointed a Cadet at Large, in the year 1837, and entered the Military Academy in September, at the age of sixteen. Whilst a Cadet, his frank and steady manners, his good humor and ready wit, made him a favorite with his class. There were in the class of 1842, Eustis, Lovell, Whiting, Stanton, Baker, Perry and Abert, all sons of army or navy officers.

After graduating, Mr. Baker was promoted, July 1st, 1842, (we take his etat de service from Cullum's Register), to Brevet Second Lieutenant, and attached to the Third Infantry. Served in the Florida War, 1842; in garrison at Fort Stansbury, Florida, 1842-43; and Jefferson Barracks, Missouri, 1843-44; on frontier duty at Fort Jessup (Camp Wilkins) La., 1844; appointed Second Lieutenant, Sixth Infantry, March 30th, 1844; and on frontier duty at Fort Towson, I. T., 1844-45.

He was then appointed Assistant Instructor of Infantry Tactics, at West Point, where he served from the 19th of June, 1845, to the 15th of August, 1851, more than six years. He was in the meantime promoted to the First Lieutenancy, April 5th, 1851.

On the third of December, 1851, Lieutenant Baker was joined in marriage to Miss Anna B. Dwight, an estimable lady, of one of the old families of Springfield, Mass. This marriage may have had some effect in shaping his future course; for shortly thereafter, to-wit, on the 3d of December, 1851, he resigned from the army. Subsequently he passed his time in attention to the duties of his family, in reading, recreation, the pleasant society of friends; and in foreign travel.

He was abroad at the breaking out of the Rebellion, the great Civil War in 1861. He returned here in May, of that year, and immediately offered his services to the General Government. Of this no notice was taken by the Secretary of War; and then, on a call from the Governor of Connecticut, he went to Hartford and organized the Fifth Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers.

When this regiment was ready for the field, he went to Washington, and, learning that there were two vacancies in a cavalry regiment, which service he desired, he made a personal application for one of them. In this he was supported by General Scott, who strongly recommended him, saying that he would consider it a personal favor to himself, to have Mr. Baker appointed; and that if he had intended to retain his command of the army, he would have placed Mr. Baker on his personal staff. Being unsuccessful in obtaining an appointment, Mr. Baker retired to his family, and with them spent, in quiet, a few years at Madison, N. J.

In the year 1867, on the death of his father, Col. Baker, he removed to Windham, Conn., the old family home. He passed several winters in New York, and spent much of his time in Europe. His winter residence was on Fifth Avenue, where he quietly breathed his last, in the bosom of his family, on the 28th day of February, A. D., 1881.

For years his health had been noticed to be failing, but, still, when death came, it seemed, at least to his loved ones, to come with sudden and unexpected shock. Three daughters, Ella, Cora, and Anna Dwight, remain to comfort their widowed mother in her bereavement.

THOMAS L. ALEXANDER.

NO. 615. CLASS OF 1830.

Died, March 11, 1881, at Louisville, Kentucky, aged 73.

Time, the destroyer as well as beautifier, to appease the craving of his insatiable greed, has impressed another victim from the three remaining members of the class of 1830, to swell the mortuary array whose names are registered on the muster-roll of death.

Lieutenant-Colonel THOS. L. ALEXANDER has passed away. He died, not as soldiers love to die, encompassed by the stirring attributes of battle, nor was his burial service accompanied by the ostentatious splendors of war, but he passed away at his peaceful abode, surrounded by sympathising friends in his last moments, with a look significant of a joyous hereafter, reproving the tear of temporal adieu; while his sepulchral rites, although imposing, were ruffled neither by the blaze of musketry, nor the beat of the muffled drum. But, although his earthly career is ended, his services still speak as with a living voice, and such as are recorded by the Department, (having been courteously furnished to the writer by the Adjutant-General of the Army) are herewith submitted for the inspection of his surviving comrades in arms.

C., from May 16th, 1858, to March 8th, 1864.

Retired from active service October 16th, 1863, from disability resulting from exposure in the line of duty.

On duty under orders from the commanding officer at Louisville, Kentucky, from March 9th, 1864, to August 16th, 1866; member of the examining board of applicants for promotion in the army to December 31st, 1867; on court-martial duty, in the Department of the Cumberland, from June 20th, 1868, to January 22d, 1869; unemployed to date of death, which occurred at Louisville, Kentucky, of Brights disease, March 11th, 1881.

To the military history of this war-worn veteran it will not be inappropriate to add a few paragraphs touching his relations with society.

Born in Prince William County, Virginia, he counted as one of his ancestors Richard Henry Lee, a distinguished statesman. At an early age the family of young Alexander migrated to Kentucky, from which State he was appointed a cadet at the Military Academy. In 1834 he married Nannie C. Bullitt, an interesting young lady, a resident of Louisville, who lived only one year afterwards, leaving a son, Thos. Alexander, who in turn succumbed to the fell destroyer in August, 1880, in Brittany, France.

He married again, in 1844, Miss Maria Brooke Kelly, of New Orleans, who died in 1849, leaving one son, Ludwell, who also died in 1870.

He married his last wife, who still survives him, in 1850. Her maiden name was Sallie Rudd, a young lady so highly esteemed in the select circles of Louisville, her native city, that, it might truly be said of her, as of another celebrated in song, "to know her was to love her."

By this marriage, which took place at Louisville, to Colonel Alexander were born eight sons, two only of whom survive him, named, respectively, Gerard and George Hancock. The eldest son, named after his esteemed friend R. H. Lee, was a Lieutenant in the Seventh Regiment of Cavalry, and died in 1875.

A year after his retirement, in 1863, Colonel Alexander selected for his permanent residence a beautiful country seat at Mount Airy, a romantic spot, situated near the city of Louisville. It was here that he passed the remnant of his declining years, soothed by the tender assiduities of an affectionate wife and cheered by the frequent visits of sympathizing friends. Having joined the Catholic Church in 1846, from that period he exhibited marks of the true Christian, and in his last moments the conscious pressure of his hand indicated his sense of an approaching glorious hereafter, thereby reproaching the tears unavoidably shed at the temporary adieu.

The physical system of Colonel Alexander was never very strong, as may be inferred from the frequent leaves of absence granted him, as appears by his military record; and for a year preceding his death he suffered greatly from the seeds of the disease to which eventually he succumbed. But what was lost in physical ability, was compensated for in moral strength.

To that high resolve, which, like a knight in armor of proof, battles with adversity, was joined that facile pliancy of disposition which easily yields to the impulses of affection. Although amiability was the general characteristic of his mood, yet occasionally a slight annoyance would cause him to exhibit traits of anger that would lead one, unacquainted with his humor, to imagine that he was habitually ill-tempered. He was easily excited, but his wrath was like the ephemeral shower of spring, and his good nature shone out all the brighter after the cloud had passed.

An amusing instance of the idiosyncrasy of disposition was witnessed by the writer while present at the session of a court-martial, held at Vera Cruz, soon after the surrender of the city in the spring of 1847.

The room in which the court was held had evidently been exposed during the siege to the missiles of the opposing batteries, the delapidated condition of its appointments, including that of the chairs, testifying conclusively to the frequent visits of the intrusive guests. Some of the chairs, in particular, had been damaged to that extent as, had they been submitted to the irony of a Board of Survey, would have exempted them forever afterwards from further duty, while others had escaped the cannonade with their proportions undiminished.

On the morning designated for convening the court, notwithstanding the objectionable character of some of the furniture, the Orderly in attendance was enabled to select from the debris a sufficient number of what he deemed serviceable chairs, which he placed around the table for the accommodation of the members. Unfortunately, in his eagerness to select the requisite number, he had overlooked a fracture in the one intended for Colonel Alexander, the nature of which was exhibited by a broken round. At the summons of the President for the gentlemen to take their seats, all the members complied with the exception of Colonel Alexander, who remained doggedly standing by his chair, as if utterly oblivious of the authoritative mandate.

"Colonel Alexander will please take his seat," mildly enjoined the President. But the Colonel was in no wise disposed to listen to the grave intimation of his superior. On the contrary, eyeing for a moment with a look of withering contempt the dilapidated chair, he cast it across the room with such a force as to render it utterly incompetent for further liability, much to the amusement of the members of the court, as exhibited by ill suppressed titters at the summary method pursued by the irate member to express his indignation at the fancied slight by visiting his wrath on the innocent occasion of it.

Perhaps it will not be irrelevant to add that soon afterwards, a suitable chair having been provided for the Colonel, he quietly assumed both his seat and his equanimity. No more fitting conclusion to this imperfect sketch can be had than by quoting the words of General T. B. Smith, an old comrade of Colonel Alexander, who, "having been his subordinate for many years, and honored by his friendship, early learned at the bivouac and around the camp-fire to appreciate the noble qualities of his commander, which attracted the love and commanded the esteem of all who approached him." Referring to him whom he had followed in the field, and whom, as one of the pall bearers, he had the melancholy satisfaction of following to the grave, he observes:

"His genial qualities, his exemplary life, his Christian virtues endeared him to all with whom he was associated, and left upon all with whom he came in contact the impress of his generous nature. His imposing presence, his kindly, loving nature, his generous impulses, his true dignity of character, his stainless honor and integrity, his knightly and chivalrous bearing, united to make a 'combination and a form, indeed, which give the world assurance of a man.'"

EMORY UPTON.

No. 1895. CLASS OF 1861.—MAY.

Died, March 15, 1881, at San Francisco, Cal., aged 42.

EMORY UPTON entered the Military Academy in 1856, and graduated therefrom No. 8, in a class of forty-five members, on May 6th, 1861. The prospects of active service were but limited during the first four years of his cadet life. The never-ceasing Indian troubles opened to the cadet of that day the only avenue for possible experience in the art of war until in 1860-61—the political complications brought into greater prominence those who had been instructed in the profession of arms. Upton having completed his Academic course at the real opening of the war, was, with his class-mates, immediately assigned to duty, drilling and disciplining volunteers for active service. His service, abilities and characteristics were such that a proper account of them can not be given in a brief notice such as this. A more extended memoir, now in course of preparation, will exhibit him in his youth and manhood, in preparation and in action, as a soldier and a man, worthy of study and emulation. His official career is briefly given in General Cullum's Biographical Register of graduates, and to this it is necessary only to add here a few words.

During his cadet life he was modest, unassuming and earnestly conscientious. In class standing he never retrograded. Although ambitious in the highest degree, none suspected, in the silent and steadfast student, the intense desire of professional excellence that wholly animated and controlled him.

The son of worthy Christian parents, whose lives exemplified their faith in Christ, he gave early evidence of the fruit of their teaching and example. Supported in his high resolves by the affectionate love of his brothers and sisters, he made constant advances towards that higher life on earth which supports and sustains us through all trials to the end. A perusal of his home letters during his cadetship shows the gradual and steady growth and final development of high manly principles, based on Christian conviction, which enabled him to bear all things worthily. An acknowledged believer in Christ, he squared his life according to his creed, and attended strictly, yet lovingly, to all the ordinances of his church.

He was not, in the ordinary sense, a rounded man. His characteristics were not of that common and evenly-balanced order which marks the merely safe, judicious and pleasant-tempered man. He had, rather, one highly developed trait around which all others were grouped, and which, boldly standing out, individualized him among his comrades. Intense conscientiousness to know the right, and the prayer for strength to do it, marked strongly all his thoughts and actions.

He was a painstaking and faithful, but not a brilliant scholar. That which he mastered entered into the fibre of his mind, and was always utilized at the proper time and in the proper place. As a student, he took possibly a higher rank, due to a strict sense of duty, in his studies than his natural abilities would probably have placed him. But as a soldier, he made the best use of his acquired knowledge; and having a very high natural practical talent for his profession, he was second to none of his comrades.

A careful study of his career shows clearly that his rapid rise in rank and command was due to merit alone, and was never, in reality, commensurate with his true deserts. No political or social influence aided him but the impressive influence of marked and brilliant success in every action in which he was engaged. He possessed, in a high degree, that rare "coup d'œil militaire," and in action, always became a cool, collected, rational commander, with a reserve of almost electric energy, ready to be utilized at the opportune moment. When the battle ended, the grand human sympathy with which his heart was filled, overflowed in kindest care to the dead and the dying. Beloved by his men, their unbounded belief in his leadership gave him so secure a support that he often dared, and succeeded in the more hazardous enterprises which often tempted him to action.

His whole life was devoted to his profession, and the latter has been vastly enriched by his life. His true place as an actor in the late war, his improvements in the tactics resulting in his wide experience, and his labors for the advancement of the profession of arms, will, in time to come, be appreciated at their true value.

His death, at the age of young manhood, saddened all hearts. The army lost in him an active spirit, the country a brave, patriotic citizen, and all of us a well-beloved comrade.

JOHN McNUTT.

No. 1019. CLASS OF 1840.

Died March 28, 1881, at Paris, France, aged 62.

JOHN McNUTT was born in Ohio in 1819, and appointed a cadet July 1, 1836; was graduated in 1840, standing number three in his class. He was appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant of Ordnance, July 1, 1840; Second Lieutenant, March 27, 1842; First Lieutenant, March 3, 1847; Captain, July 1, 1854; Major, September 12, 1864; Lieutenant-Colonel, June 23, 1874; retired from active service May 27, 1878.

Colonel McNutt's service of nearly forty years was entirely in the Ordnance. During the Mexican War he was in command of the Ordnance Depot at Point Isabel, Texas, and at Monterey, Mexico. During the Rebellion he was Ordnance Officer in fitting out the Port Royal Expedition in 1861, and from 1861 to 1865, as Chief of Ordnance, Department of Kansas.

Colonel McNutt's body was buried in Paris, but will probably be brought to his own country to find a final resting place.

A more extended obituary was promised of Colonel McNutt, but as it was not received in time, the above brief record of his services was taken from General Cullum's Register.

TIMOTHY M. BRYAN.

No. 1703. CLASS OF 1855.

Died, April 8, 1881, at Vincentown, N. J., aged 49.

GEORGE A. KENSEL.

NO. 1769. CLASS OF 1857.

Died April 17, 1881, at New Haven, Conn., aged 45.

Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel GEORGE A. KENSEL, Captain Fifth Artillery, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in the year 1836, and moved with his family to Lexington, Ky., at an early age.

Appointed as a cadet, he entered the United States Military Academy, July 1, 1857, and graduating with high honors, was commissioned as a Brevet Second Lieutenant of Artillery, and was shortly afterwards assigned to duty with Light Battery "B," Fourth Artillery, with which he served during the Utah Expedition of 1857 and 1858, being promoted to a Second Lieutenancy Fourth Artillery, August 17, 1857. He afterwards served on frontier duty at Cheyenne Pass, Forts Laramie and Randall, Dakota Territory, and was transferred with his Battery, "L," Fourth Artillery, to Fort Monroe, Virginia, in June, 1860, where he remained till the outbreak of the Rebellion of the Seceding States.

Appointed a First Lieutenant Fourth Artillery, March 1st, 1861, he was transferred, with the same rank, to the Fifth Artillery, May 14, 1861, joining Griffin's West Point Battery, afterwards known as Battery "D," Fifth Artillery, with which he was engaged in the battle of Bull Run, July 21st, 1861, doing gallant service. He served with his battery in the defenses of Washington, D. C., until September, 1861, when, having been appointed Captain and Assistant Quartermaster August 3d, 1861, he was assigned to duty at Boston, Massachusetts. Being selected by Major-General Butler as Chief of Artillery of the Expedition to New Orleans, La., he proceeded to Ship Island with the command; was appointed Chief of Artillery and Ordnance, Department of the Gulf, and was among the first to enter the city of New Orleans after its surrender. He remained on duty in the Department of the Gulf until January, 1863, when General Butler, being relieved from command, he was placed on waiting orders at Boston, Massachusetts. Promoted to a Captaincy in the Fifth Artillery, October 8th, 1862, he resigned his Staff appointment as Quartermaster, preferring service with the line of the army. He joined his Battery, "H," Fifth Artillery, at Murfreesboro, Tennessee, in June, 1863, and served gallantly in action with it at the battle of Hoover's Gap, Tennessee, June 25th and 26th, 1863, during the Tallahoma Campaign of the Army of the Cumberland. He was appointed Chief of Artillery, Twentieth Army Corps, Army of the Cumberland, July 1st, 1863, and served as such with great distinction during the advance on Chattanooga, Tenn., and at the battle of Chickamauga, Georgia, September 19th and 20th, 1863. Being transferred to Battery "I," of his regiment, in October, 1863, he was ordered to the Department of Washington, and was shortly afterwards appointed Lieutenant-Colonel and Assistant Inspector-General Eighteenth Army Corps, and Department of North Carolina, serving as such from November, 1863, to February, 1865, and afterwards as Assistant Inspector-General of the Twenty-fourth Army Corps, and of the Department of Virginia, until August, 1865, being engaged with his usual gallantry in a number of actions during the final campaign, terminating with the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia.

For his services during the War of the Rebellion, he received the Brevet of Major, September 20th, 1863, for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Chickamauga, Georgia; of Lieutenant-Colonel March 13th, 1865, for meritorious services while serving as Chief of Artillery of the Department of the Gulf, and of Virginia and North Carolina, and for gallant conduct in action before Drury's Bluff, Virginia, and of Colonel United States Volunteers March 13th, 1865, for gallant and meritorious services during the Rebellion.

Immediately after the close of the war he was ordered on duty at the United States Military Academy, where he served with great credit, as Assistant Professor of Mathematics, from August 31st, 1865, to August 28th, 1869, when he rejoined his Battery. His after services were continuously with his regiment in the Departments of the East and South, one year being spent at the Artillery School, Fort Monroe, Virginia, as Instructor of Mathematics.

He was a loyal citizen and a gallant and faithful officer, and his honor and integrity never questioned. His gentle disposition made him many friends, who sincerely regret his death.

In 1864, he married a daughter of the late Colonel W. A. Thompson, of Boston, Massachusetts. His widow and four children survive him, and mourn the loss of a loving husband, and kind and affectionate father.

SAMUEL A. CHERRY.

No. 2,584. CLASS OF 1875.

Killed, May 11, 1881, near Fort Niobrara, Nebraska, aged 31 years.

SAMUEL AUSTIN CHERRY was born in Indiana in April, 1850, and entered the Military Academy July 1st, 1870. In August of that year, while engaged in mounting a field piece belonging to the old Ringgold Battery, the detachment lost control of the piece and it fell upon Cherry's leg, the result being a severe contusion which necessitated a long stay in the hospital and finally a sick leave of considerable length.

On this account Cherry was obliged to join the succeeding class with which he graduated June 16, 1875, being appointed Second Lieutenant in the 23d Infantry. He joined his regiment at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyoming Territory, September 30th, 1875; was transferred August 24th, 1876, to the Fifth Cavalry, and continued serving, with this post as his permanent station, till the winter of 1879. Meanwhile, however, he saw much hard service in the field, being in the Big Horn expedition from September 28th, 1876, to October 24th, 1876; A. A. Q. M. and A. C. S. at Camp Brown, Wyoming, from August 25th, 1877, to November 16th, 1877; on sick leave from December 17th, 1877, to February 20th, 1878, when he rejoined his company at Fort Fred. Steele, where he remained till June 8th, 1878; was then in the field, Northern Wyoming, to December 11th, 1878, when he returned to Fort Russell; was on a scout in the field again from January 19th, 1879, to February 28th, 1879; on expedition to White River Agency, in the Ute country, from September 20th, 1879, to November 29th, 1879, being engaged in the action with Ute Indians at Milk River, Colorado, September 29th, 1879, and besieged by them to October 5th, 1879. He was Adjutant of this expedition and in command of the advance guard, when the ambush prepared by the Indians was discovered. The courage and presence of mind displayed by Lieutenant Cherry on this trying occasion, no doubt, saved the command from complete annihilation. With a "quick and soldierly perception of the situation," to use the words of Captain Payne, he turned back and made signs for the command to retrace their steps. All are familiar with the story of the bloody and disastrous fight that followed, the sufferings of the brave command while besieged in the hastily constructed pit, and their long and weary, but hopeful waiting for the aid they knew the gallant Merritt would surely bring them. The country will long remember those terrible days of suspense and anxiety passed in waiting, the results of the wonderful march that brought salvation to Thornburgh's unfortunate command. For the part he played all through that trying time, Cherry received the greatest possible praise. He there exhibited such soldierly qualities as gave splendid promise of future success in his profession.

He was with his company at Fort Russell to December 27th, 1879; on leave to May 1, 1880; member of a Board at Washington, D. C., for the examination of applicants for appointment as Superintendents of National Cemeteries to June 25th, 1880; rejoined company and at Fort Niobrara from July 11th, 1880, to May 9th, 1881, when he left with detachment in pursuit of a party of desperadoes and was shot and killed about 25 miles north of Fort Niobrara, May 11, 1881, by one of his own men who is supposed to have been insane.

From this it will be seen that in his short term of service Cherry had done much worthy to be rewarded. In his death the class of '75 is called to mourn the loss of one endeared to all by many a tender and manly quality shown during our years of struggles and triumphs together at the Academy, and the country the loss of one of its most gallant and promising young officers. We can recall with sadness now his ever genial nature and his many sterling qualities of mind and heart, and feel that in none could be found a fitter name than his to be placed on the roll of honor beside that of our brave and beloved STURGIS. (Classmate.)

BENJAMIN H. WRIGHT.

No. 304. CLASS OF 1822.

Died, May 13, 1881, at Rome, N. Y., aged 80.

BENJAMIN HALL WRIGHT was born in Rome, N. Y., October 19, 1801. His father was one of the first Engineers of the Erie Canal. Mr. Wright was appointed a Cadet September 14, 1818; graduated July 1, 1822, and was appointed Second Lieutenant Second Infantry; resigned June 1, 1823, serving less than a year in garrison duty at Sackett's Harbor, N. Y.

His occupation in civil life was that of civil engineer, and he was the first to establish railroads in the Island of Cuba, surveying the first road built from Havana to Guines. He was in the service of the Spanish government for one year as Principal Engineer, and built two other lines from 1836 to 1842.

He was also employed on other works of importance by the Spanish government. Mr. Wright had difficulty in getting his pay from the Spanish government and commenced suit to recover. In this he encountered an obstacle which would seem almost unsurmountable to most men. He was unable to obtain the services of a Cuban lawyer in his suit against the Spanish. Mr. Wright promptly solved the problem by obtaining a thorough knowledge of the Spanish language and familiarizing himself with the law in the case. The result was that his suit was successful and he recovered the full amount due him. After his return to this country much of his time was spent in translating the Spanish language for the United States authorities and others. He was considered one of the best Spanish scholars in this country.

Mr. Wright was one of the first men in the country to conceive the idea of introducing steam as a motive power for canal boats. He proceeded to make experiments in this direction, and in the year 1856 put his ideas to the first practical test. He caused to be built a small rotary engine of peculiar construction and placed it in a small open boat. Accompanied by his cousin, W. E. Wright, from Rome, New York, he made a trip from Rome to New London and return in this boat. He afterward built a large engine and, placing it in a first-class canal boat, took a load to New York. His idea was to get a sufficient amount of power for all practical purposes from a very small amount of heating surface. Mr. Wright expended several thousand dollars experimenting and was engaged in the work a number of years. His idea was a good one, but it was never developed sufficiently to bring him any returns. Mr. Wright was one of the oldest graduates of the Academy and only two members of his class survive him.

WILLIAM H. FRENCH.

NO. 912. CLASS OF 1837.

Died, May 20, 1881, at Washington, D. C., aged 66.

GENERAL WM. H. FRENCH, whose death has been recently announced to the army and the country, was appointed from the District of Columbia a Cadet in the United States Military Academy, and entered that institution July 1, 1833. He graduated July 1, 1837, and received the commission of Second Lieutenant in the First Regiment of U. S. Artillery.

This class of 1837 bears a number of names which are very familiar to the army, several of whom enjoy a national reputation, as those of Generals H. W. Benham, Braxton Bragg, A. B. Dyer, Israel Vogdes, Thomas Williams (killed in the defense of Baton Rouge, August 5, 1862), E. D. Townsend, Jubal A. Early, John Sedgwick (killed in a reconnaissance near Spottsylvania, May 9, 1864), J. C. Pemberton and Joseph Hooker. We notice also the name of Colonel Edward G. Steptoe in the same class, whose record is familiar in Indian warfare. With the above Generals, or against them, General French had a long and well known service. In the Florida, or Seminole war; in the Cherokee removal of Indians; in the various battles of the Mexican war, we find him prominent among his companions in arms. He served there in different capacities, sometimes as Adjutant-General, sometimes as an Aide-de-Camp, and for the greater part of the time as an artillery officer in command of troops. He was brevetted twice for gallant and meritorious service in Mexico, the highest grade being that of Major. Just at the close of the Mexican campaign he was promoted to a Captaincy in his regiment.

His crowning work was accomplished during the rebellion of the Seceding States. It found him a Major of Artillery on the frontier at Fort Duncan, Texas. He saved his command from the enemy by abandoning that Fort and marching his force to the mouth of the Rio Grande as early as February, 1861, where he succeeded in embarking it and in distributing it to the Forts on the Florida coast. He was kept at Key West, in that State, till November, 1861. It appears that Major French's ability and gallantry had been noticed at Washington, for he received, in September, 1861, a promotion to the rank of Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and was ordered North to the defenses of Washington.

During the fall and winter of 1861 and 1862 he had a Brigade in General Sumner's Division in front of Alexandria. This he diligently reorganized and prepared by discipline and drill for the ensuing eventful year. General Sumner had great confidence in General French's excellent military judgment. His wide experience and thorough military knowledge especially fitted him to organize and discipline the new regiments committed to his care. Early in March, 1862, Sumner's command began its advance. The retirement of the enemy from his front at Centerville caused this advance, which had for its object to determine certainly the fact of the retreat and to pursue Stuart's Cavalry beyond the Rappahannock. All this was preparatory to following the remainder of McClellan's army as a rear guard by means of steamer transportation to the Peninsula of Virginia.

General French bore an active and distinguished part in these preliminary operations. Then followed that series of battles, after the siege of Yorktown; Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, &c., &c., on to Malvern Hill, in each of which he took a prominent part. General French kept on the advanced lines on the second day of Fair Oaks (or Seven Pines, as the Confederates call the battle). He was so marked that day that he received the Brevet of Lieutenant-Colonel in the Regular Army for gallant and meritorious conduct in the action. The conflict was, for a part of that day, as severe, and the battle as closely contested as any that took place during the war.

The timely operations of Sumner's Corps, a brigade of which General French commanded, certainly saved the left of McClellan's army from a terrible defeat. French's Brigade occupied a most important position in Sumner's advance, and did there cheerful, gallant and persistent service.

It would require more space than is given to this paper to follow General French through the various campaigns and the dozen battles of the Armies of the East, in which he was actively engaged during the Rebellion.

At Chancellorsville his Division, the second day, was deployed and put into action not far from the Chancellorsville House. It was formed in an opening and marched into a wood where the firing was constant and severe, the bullets hissing between the trees with fearful effect. It was noticed and remarked that not one man of French's gallant Division straggled, or fell out from the ranks, till the wounding or the death stroke made vacant places. The Division pressed forward into the brisk action with its brave commander to do most effective work in choking the progress of the hitherto successful assailants. For this action General French was brevetted a Brigadier-General in the Regular Army. This brevet was soon followed by that of Major-General for gallant and meritorious service during the Rebellion.

The subject of this sketch became Colonel of the Fourth Artillery before his retirement from active service. General French was a large size man, about six feet in height. In his later life he was quite fleshy. He was of marked presence, evidently a man of decided individuality, very positive in his convictions and faithful to his ideas of duty. He was one of our strong, patriotic souls.

To such as he the country owes its very existence. General French's companions and friends remember him with esteem and affection; and he justly holds a high place on the roll of honor.

MISCELLANEOUS BUSINESS

The report of the Treasurer, was, after considerable discussion about changing the word "Alumni" to "Association," accepted and adopted.

The following report of the Thayer Monument Committee was presented by Gen. Andrews :

315, Fifth Avenue, New York, April 23, 1881.

I leave in the hands of the Secretary of the Thayer Monument Committee, as I will be absent in Europe at the time of the next Re-union of the Association of Graduates of the Military Academy, the following report:

The delay in carrying out the wishes of the Association has been caused by the want of funds to erect a bronze statue, so desirable to perpetuate the memory of the "Father of the Military Academy." This cherished hope being defeated, it was next proposed to erect an obelisk, with suitable devices, upon the Plain at West Point, but no designs fully met the views of the Committee. While thus awaiting the progress of events, the granite statue of Alexander Hamilton was erected in New York Central Park. I was so pleased with its artistic character and the beauty and durability of its materiel, that, the day after it was unveiled, I invited its sculptor—Mr. Conrads—to make a critical examination of it with me, and, the day after, to accompany me to West Point to meet the whole Committee. After a free discussion, it was decided that, as we had not the means of procuring a bronze statue, one of granite solved the problem of a suitable monument far better than any stone shaft in the Plain or over the grave of the great Superintendent. Mr. Conrads was accordingly invited to embody our ideas in a clay statuette. Some weeks later he submitted to the Committee's inspection two quarter-size models, one representing a figure in undress military uniform, as worn in the days of Colonel Thayer; and the other, the same design gracefully draped with a cloak. Of the two, the Committee much preferred the latter after suggesting some slight modifications. It was, therefore, resolved to guaranty to the New England Granite Company the sum of Four Thousand Dollars to execute a statue eight feet three inches high, standing upon a well proportioned pedestal of eight feet, both of pure white granite, and to erect the same on such a spot at West Point as may be chosen by the Committee. This sum of $4,000, though it considerably exceeds our present available funds, it is hoped may be secured from graduates and their friends. At all events it is the best we can possibly do, and amounts only to about one-fourth of what a bronze statue with proper pedestal would cost, and not more than would be required to erect an unartistic obelisk or other monument of durable stone.

Since submitting the statuette, Mr. Conrads, at my request, has modeled a clay bust of General Thayer, from the best attainable data. The Committee, and others, were invited to inspect it, on the 12th inst., at the Sculptor's Studio in Hartford, Conn. No one, however, was present except General Morell and myself, which is much to be regretted, as the likeness and artistic treatment of the head were the most important things for consideration. After suggesting some modifications, the whole matter has been left in the hands of the sculptor, who will at once proceed to model the full-sized statue and pedestal, and, when completed, I hope it will be freely criticised by the Committee and by other graduates. I feel assured that Gen. Morell, who becomes the Chairman of the Committee in my absence, will do everything in his power to ensure entire success in the execution of the design, and I ardently hope that something worthy of the great soldier, who, for sixteen years, so successfully superintended our cherished Alma Mater, will be erected at West Point before the re-union of our Association in June, 1882.

Respectfully Submitted,
 GEO. W. CULLUM,
 Bvt. Major-General, U. S. A.
 Chairman of Thayer Monument Committee.

General Andrews, Treasurer of the Thayer Monument Fund, reported that there had been no change in the funds in his charge since the last meeting of the Association.

The reports of the Committee and Treasurer were accepted.

The following extract of a letter written by Crafts J. Wright, class of 1828, was presented and read by the Secretary:

"I regret to say that I cannot attend at West Point at the annual meeting, June 9, 1881. * * * Besides I am in the early dawn of the enjoyment of my honeymoon, and even in Biblical times that event formed an excuse. But this is not my fault—it is only the fiftieth—the golden celebration, since March 31, 1831, with one wife, and therefore I cannot come. Please ask the Society to have me excused."

On motion, Gen. Wright was excused from attending at this meeting, and the Secretary directed to so inform him.

After some discussion about changing the By-Laws, so as to admit a class of members to be known as "Annual Members," who were to be admitted for one year upon payment of one dollar, the subject was laid on the table.

The following was unanimously adopted:

Whereas, It is proposed by patriotic citizens to erect an equestrian statue of Major-General John F. Reynolds, in Fairmount Park, in Philadelphia.

Resolved, That the erection of a statue to commemorate the services and gallant death of our former comrade, friend and fellow graduate, General John F. Reynolds, who fell so nobly at Gettysburg, meets with the earnest approval of this Association.

Resolved, That our Presiding Officer be authorized to appoint a member of this Association to act as its representative in the meeting of the representatives from the former commands serving under General Reynolds, which is to be held in Philadelphia about the first of July next.

General Russell Thayer, class of 1874, was appointed to represent the Association at the proposed meeting in Philadelphia.

On motion, the Chairman was directed to appoint a committee of three to prepare a design for a Permanent Badge for the Association, and report at the next meeting.

Egbert L. Viele, R. N. Price and Russell Thayer, were appointed as the committee.

The following, by General McCalmont, Class of 1842, was, after some discussion, rejected:

Resolved, That this Association extends a cordial invitation to the surviving members of the classes of 1823-32-42-52-62 and 72 to meet with us at the next annual reunion in June, 1882.

The following, by General McCalmont, was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the special thanks of the Association are due to, and are hereby tendered to Prof. H. L. KENDRICK, our retiring Treasurer, for his very faithful attention to the duties of his office during his long period of service since the organization of the Association.

The Chairman then appointed the following Committees, and announced the Officers of the Association for the ensuing year:

Committee on the Thayer Monument.	}	GENERAL CULLUM.
		GENERAL SCHOFIELD.
		GENERAL MORELL.
		PROFESSOR ANDREWS.
		PROFESSOR LARNED.
		CAPTAIN SEARS.

Executive Committee.	}	GENERAL CULLUM.
		PROFESSOR KENDRICK.
		PROFESSOR WHEELER.
		PROFESSOR MICHIE.
		CAPTAIN E. S. GODFREY.

Secretary—LIEUT. CHARLES BRADEN.

Treasurer—PROF. S. E. TILLMAN.

The thanks of the Association were, on motion, tendered to the Presiding Officer, and to Judge Findlay, for his very interesting personal reminiscences.

There being no further business, the meeting adjourned.

CHARLES BRADEN,

First Lieut., U. S. A.

Secretary.

ENTERTAINMENT.

At 7:30, P. M., the members proceeded to the West Point Army Mess, where they partook of the usual dinner, General Daniel Tyler, Class of 1819, presiding.

The following were the regular toasts, prepared by Prof. J. B. Wheeler:

OUR COUNTRY—Next to our God, our duty is to our Country. Responded to by Gen. George S. Greene.

THE FLAG—Beautiful as a flower to those who love it; terrible as a meteor to those who hate. It is the symbol of the power, the glory and the honor of our country. Responded to by Gen. W. T. Sherman.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE U. S.—The man condemned to bear the public burden of the Nation's care. Responded to by Col. T. F. Barr.

THE ARMY AND NAVY—In time of need, ever at hand. Responded to by Gen. H. W. Slocum.

OUR ALMA MATER—May she live longer than I have time to tell her years. Ever beloved. Responded to by Gen. Horace Porter.

OUR DEAD—After life's fitful fever they sleep well. Drank in silence.

OUR ACADEMIC FRIENDSHIPS—Born in the morning of life, they form its evening shadows, strengthening the setting sun of life. Responded to by Gen. Milo S. Hascall and Marshall T. Polk.

WOMAN—Heaven's best gift ; man's joy and pride in prosperity ; man's support and comfort in affliction, or

"Auld nature swears, the lovely dears,
Her noblest work she classes, O ;
Her prentice han' she tried on man,
And then she made the lasses, O."

Responded to by Prof. H. L. Kendrick.

After the regular toasts, remarks were made by Gen. Sherman, Colonel Gibson, General McCalmont, Prof. Michie, and a few other gentlemen present.

An impromptu Glee Club was organized by Loyall Farragut, who was thoughtful enough to bring a number of books containing old time Cadet songs. The songs of the "Club" were very much enjoyed. As the tables were gradually broken up, many of the graduates attended the Graduating Hop in the Cadet Mess Hall ; others lingered around the board, telling stories, &c, until about 12 o'clock, when the banquet hall was turned over to the Cadets.

Photographs of members, additions to the Library and Scrap Book, and valuable corrections to Register of Graduates, have been received during the past year.

PERSONAL REMINISCENCES

—OF—

THE U. S. MILITARY ACADEMY,

Read to the U. S. Military Service Institute, West Point, N. Y., March 28, 1878,

BY THE LATE

PROFESSOR ALBERT E. CHURCH.

GENTLEMEN :

It is well for every successful professional or business man, at times to turn a careful look backward—not only to the period when his own career began, to the difficulties and trials which beset his early efforts, but to the history of those who preceded him in the same work and to compare, either for profit or warning, their principles of action with those which are governing him in his onward course. Particularly is this well for the soldier, whose profession is to so great an extent dependent upon the history of the military operations and scientific principles of those who have made themselves great in war. To us, too, who feel so great an interest in the Military Academy, and who are daily laboring for its improvement and success, it may be well, occasionally, to turn our thoughts to the story of its early days, to the details of its early working, to the contemplation of the character of its early officers. If in a somewhat familiar and cursory relation of my own personal recollections of the Academy from 1824 to 1831, I am able to suggest an idea which may tend to her improvement in 1878, I shall feel that I have done a good work, and that you have not listened in vain.

Without a formal description of the physical appearance of West Point, as it presented itself to my eyes on the Sunday morning of my first arrival here, about the middle of June, 1824, I shall endeavor to give you an accurate idea of it, as its parts are connected with the various incidents which I propose to relate. This arrival happened in this wise. Having failed to connect at Poughkeepsie with the only passenger steamer then running every other day on the river, I took my passage on a sloop, a regular packet for New York, with the promise that I should be landed at West Point, though this was not a prescribed landing place. This promise, better performed than many promises made nowadays, resulted in my being put ashore at 3 o'clock in the morning at Cold Spring, in a pouring rain. Wet to the skin, I found my way to a hotel, where I impatiently waited the coming dawn and then sallied forth, in search of transportation to West Point. At the wharf I found a small sail boat freighted with a pair of black horses, just ready to cast off. Stepping on board—myself and traveling companion lugging my blue chest, the modern army trunk was not then in vogue—we were soon set down on the North wharf, then the only one in use. A sentinel, in full uniform, the only human being in sight, brought me to, and required me to write my name on a slate—a habit which for many years was strictly enforced on all coming to or leaving the Post. Upon making inquiry how we were to reach the Military Academy, for I had no idea how far we were to go, he said in a jocose manner, that we should have to walk, unless we could persuade the owner of the ponies to let us ride them up the hill. As for the chest, we could take that up ourselves, or leave it for the authorized porter, (an old soldier with one arm, the lost one being replaced by an iron hook suitable for his business,) no other person being allowed to transport baggage for hire; that he might be around in the course of the morning, but probably I should have to wait till Monday morning—a pleasant prospect for a fellow without a dry thread about him. By the way, I should say that I believe those black horses were, at that time, and for two or three years after, the only span of matched carriage horses on the Point. They belonged to the Postmaster and were always, during these years, pressed into service to draw the various dignitaries who visited the place, up the hill, among others, in two instances, General La Fayette. At this time, too, I think none of the Professors or Officers owned a horse. There were no roads suitable for carriages—scarcely so for horseback rides. Soon after this, however, other horses were brought on to the Post by officers, one span, at least, if there be any truth in doggerel poetry, for one of my fellow cadets essayed—no doubt with the view of anticipating the reputation of Patten, Poe and Bratt—a poetic description of West Point. Among his lines were these :

“And ‘Split me’ he had horses two,
The one was gray—the other blue.”

“Split me” thus known to the entire corps of cadets, was the only surgeon of the Post, whom for over two years I knew by no other name, a most estimable and highly cultivated gentleman and able physician, who ever prided himself on the style and fashion of his dress, which was, in fact rather dandyish. The horses I do not remember ever to have seen—the poetry I did. I have learned from one who remembers the horses that they were in truth both gray, and that the youthful poet had merely used a poet’s license and changed one to blue, to make a rhyme for two. This embryo poet was the son of a distinguished governor, whose father before him, and two or three brothers had also been governors. He had been once found deficient but was re-appointed the following June, was again found deficient and finally discharged. He, as a great many others do, attributed his failure to his great literary genius and consequent inability to bring his mind down to the vulgar studies of Algebra and Geometry. He bore his failure philosophically, and said as he left us, “Well, since I can’t get through West Point I will go home and be governor.”

The sentinel having pointed out my way up the hill, on the old road, still visible just below the present one, I crossed the plain diagonally, just after reveille, and passed between the two most prominent buildings of the academy, the North and South barracks, without seeing an individual, until I entered Gridley’s hotel, a large two-story wooden house on the edge of the bank, a little northeast of the present new building for public offices. Here I found several other young gentlemen ambitious of military fame. This was the only hotel in the neighborhood, where all visitors were entertained, except special official ones, who were cared for in the west end of the cadets’ mess-hall, by Mr. Cozzens, the famous ancestor of the after Cozzens’ hotel keepers.

Having relished a good breakfast, four young aspirants took their way back and across the plain—shall I describe them? Four as different specimens, in personal appearance, in character and in habits of thought, as any four that could be selected from a hundred classes. One from Middle New York, fine looking, of medium size, with genial countenance indicative of wit and humor, (he proved to be the humorist of the class,) with full and flowing ruffled shirt and a small rattan, real dandy cane, assumed command of the party, as though he had been born to it, and guided us to the Superintendent's office, then, as for many years after, in the basement of the N. E. corner of the present Superintendent's quarters. Another, a tall broad-chested six-footer from Ohio, who had been a Major of Militia, who professed to know everything about military matters, and expected to learn little on these jubescets even at this great seat of military learning. The third, a slack-twisted, rough-looking, tobacco-chewing customer from Georgia, boastful in his talk, doubtful only of his ability to exist on the pork and molasses which he understood was the principal food of the Yankees. The fourth, a quiet little fellow, serious silent and observant, the youngest of the party, a true Yankee boy from Connecticut. Of these, the first and fourth graduated with the honors of the class, the third fell an early victim to the annual epidemic which carries off so many cadets about the 1st of January. The Major, in the winter of our graduating year, went once too often to "Benny's" and was discharged. Having reported to the Superintendent and been received and questioned with that kind, yet unbending dignity for which he was ever distinguished, we were escorted by an orderly to the South Barracks, and the last three described were located by the cadet officers in charge of the new cadets, in a small room without vestige of furniture, with no place to sit except on the window sill, and left without a word of direction or advice, to discuss among ourselves what was to come and what we were next to do. Upon hearing a drum and a running to and fro, we concluded something of importance was going on, but had no idea whether it concerned us or not, until the cadet lieutenant, who had located us and so kindly left us to ourselves, rushed into the room and with an angry tone demanded, "why do you not fall in?" Now I understood the meaning of the word "fall," but into what, or from whence we were to fall, I did not know. Of course we started forth and down the stairs we went, and came near falling, literally into a heap at the bottom. Fortunately, however, we fell into the ranks already formed for church, were faced to the right and told to "forward march." At my first move, I stepped squarely on to the heel of my forward file, when he faced about and with doubled fists threatened serious war, before I felt myself sufficiently educated for it. I took a backward step, not laid down in the Tactics, when those familiar cries, "pay attention," "close up," "what are you about there," had the effect of restoring order. Poor marching soon brought us to the chapel, where after a long preliminary service I listened to a dull sermon, one hour and a quarter long, the only lasting effect of which was to lay the foundation of that dislike, which I have ever since entertained, for long sermons. Upon leaving the chapel, with strong convictions that this kind of life was not suited to my taste, and that, doubtless, I had mistaken my profession and had better set out for home on the first arriving boat, I was cordially greeted by a cadet of the third class whom I had once before seen, who took me to his room and introduced me to his room-mates, members of both the second and first classes. These cadets, instead of making me stand on tip-toe on one foot, tossing me in a blanket, or smoking me out, treated me with kindly interest, gave me correct information of what I was to do, and how to do it; in other words, treated me as a true gentleman ever treats his fellows, and thus seriously modified my resolution to go home. In the meantime, the rain which had been falling continually, ceased, the sun shone out brightly; on my return to my room I found my chest, got out of my wet clothes, and intelligently fell in for dinner with pleasant thoughts and coming appetite. If there be those present who have ever approved of the modern unkind and ungentlemanly mode of treating new comers, filled with thoughts of pleasant homes left behind, lonely and without sympathy in the midst of strangers, with virtuous resolutions to do their duty and make a name, and could they truly appreciate the dislike, amounting almost to hatred, for many years entertained, in my mind, towards that one whose harsh words and discourteous manner had nearly extinguished every spark of military ambition, and contrast it rightly with the regard and love ever after felt for those others who had so cordially received me, I am sure they would admit that it is far better to secure by kindness the humblest friend than by the reverse create the weakest enemy.

At this time there was nothing in the Corps of Cadets approaching what is now called "hazing." Every one admitted to the corps was regarded as a member of one brotherhood, and such was the "esprit de corps" that an individual treating a fellow as cadets are now treated every year, would have been expelled from the corps without the aid of military authority or presidential orders. I only remember one practical joke played upon my class, and this was not individual but general. A member of the first class hankering after tobacco, the use of which in any shape was then prohibited and difficult to obtain, put on a borrowed sash and sword and called at the rooms of the "plebes," solemnly informed them of the regulation on the subject, and directed them to turn in their tobacco, if they had any of the vile stuff, to the Quartermaster, at room No. —, North Barracks. Enough complied to furnish him tobacco for the ensuing year. At this time, too, there was little distinction of classes, in their social and friendly intercourse. Members of the first and fourth, third and second, roomed together indiscriminately, and some of my most intimate associates and friends were members of the higher classes. Rooms in barracks and tents in camp were drawn by lot, with few exceptions for cadet officers and assistant professors, whose rooms, convenient to their duties, were specially assigned by order. The choice of room mates was only limited to the company, and the lucky sets chose their rooms, in order, in the proper barrack, the most aristocratic first class man as likely to go to the poorest room in the cock loft, as the most humble plebe. I am not a convert to the belief that the modern way is an improvement on the old, either in a military or moral sense.

The present road in front of the cadet barrack extended directly East to the brow of the hill, intersecting the road running north-east along the edge of the bank through Fort Clinton, not around it as at present, and thence around the north part of the plain. Southerly the road extended along the edge of the bank in front of Gridley's hotel, passing over the site of the present hospital, back of the houses now occupied by Mr. Newlands, Lieut. Postley, &c., over the hill near Mr. Edward Kinsley's residence. Parts of this road can now be seen. This, though formerly an important road communicating with the South, was seldom used at this time, as no vehicles were allowed to come on to the Point from this direction. The only buildings on it after leaving the hotel to the Kinsley mansion, now standing on the river bank, and then occupied by the grandmother of the present Mr. Kinsley, were the barns of the hotel on the present site of the officers' mess and a farm house near the present position of Colonel Hall's quarters. Nearly all the ground south of the farmhouse as far as the Kinsley house, was then covered with heavy woods. A rough foot path, nearly on the site of the present road, was much in use by persons passing to and from the Point and Highland Falls, a village consisting of a large flouring mill and a small number of houses. The line of the Gridley property ran near the south front of the present Library building, nearly west beyond Fort Putnam—thence southerly, including the Fort, until it met Mr. Kinsley's north line, thence nearly east along this line to the river over what is now the southern boundary of the public lands. Returning to near the north-west corner of the chapel, close in the angle formed by the East and West road and the present one in front of the Academic building, stood a large one-story wooden house occupied as a barber's shop and confectionery, where were sold fruit, candies, and in the summer time soda water. The barber, by the name of Spencer, was a white man, genteel in appearance and manners, and scrupulously neat in his dress and all appointments. It was said that no man on the North river could shave more neatly and easily, and some cadets were known to assert that this was true not only in the matter of cutting the beard, but as well, in that of the sale of confectionery, &c. He lived with his family in the house which, nearly on the same site, forms a part of the school house in the yard next to Professor Wheeler's quarters. He had two young and very pretty daughters much admired and visited by some of the cadets. Joe Simpson was at this time an apprentice boy in his shop, and finally succeeded him.

Directly east of the barbers' shop was a large wood yard, surrounded by a very high and close built fence. In this yard was kept the public wood, no other fuel being then in use on the Post. East of this and extending to the south road was a low building used as a kind of ordnance and artillery store house.

The business of entertaining visitors, furnished by no means, a sufficient maintenance for the Gridley family, to it was added that of entertaining cadets. Scarcely a night passed in which one or more parties did not enjoy the excellent suppers set forth by this enterprising host. The facilities for this were many and great. The hotel and all the property were entirely independent of the Academic authorities, and beyond their control. It was but a step through the wood yard to the hotel entrance; through the wood yard, for has mortal man yet been born who could construct a wooden fence so high and so tight as to prove a serious obstacle to an energetic boy who desired to pass that way, particularly to an energetic cadet, who desired to add varieties to his mess-hall fare? varieties which they say are bountifully spread out in the mess-hall of the present day, but varieties indeed in the primitive times of which I write. In the rear of the barber's shop and out of sight of the barracks and all their immediate surroundings, were hung, by a single nail at the top with secret fastening at the bottom, various boards, so innocently and smoothly as to defy the eyes of the most cute inspector ignorant of the secret. Through the opening easily made, the initiated could pass, undiscovered even in the daytime, on the errand of ordering supper, and more securely after night-fall, when the hour of supper had arrived.

I have an idea that inspections of barracks were both in the evening and after taps, more frequent and unexpected than at the present time, yet when a cadet was caught absent from his room, as he often was, his room mate or friend had but to step through the fence and announce the fact. The absentee would report his return from his necessary absence, before the expiration of the authorized ten minutes, and then return to supper. All this was an evil and a nuisance, and the Superintendent, Colonel Thayer, took effectual measures to abate it. Through his influence Congress in the early winter of 1824-5 appropriated $10,000 for the purchase of the Gridley property. Gridley accepted the cash and in the early spring left with his family for Newburgh, where they lived many years, ever regretting the old place and that they had let the Government off with so small a sum.

The hotel was at once fitted up as a cadet hospital, in the place of the old yellow building located in the then thick woods not far from the present band barracks, and the farm house, near Colonel Hall's, occupied as officers' quarters. What was Gridley's loss was great gain to "Benny Havens, Oh!" I cannot learn that previous to this spring "Benny" had ever done enough to render him worthy of having his name sung in verse. I do know that from this time he became an institution for many years of wide renown. He then lived in the most northerly of the two houses on the river shore, underneath Buttermilk Falls. The house now looks much as it did then. To this there was at once a rush, and for years after he had a monopoly of the business. I must say, however, without the least desire to detract from a fame so wide spread and now so classic, that those who had tried the suppers of both, insisted that those of "Old Grid," though never praised in poetry or song, far surpassed those which set the tune for O'Brien's muse.

Returning again to my origin of co-ordinates, the corner of the Barber's shop, directly North, about fifty yards, on the site of the road now leading to the present hotel, was located the "old North Barracks," a four-story rectangular stone building with plain walls without the least ornamentation. The only entrance then in use, was in the middle of the south face. The corresponding door in the north face was fastened up. Through the middle of each story ran a long hall, into which all the rooms opened by a single door. On the east of the entrance, on the lower story, was the guard room, by the open door of which every cadet passed, in coming in, or going out. Opposite was a wide stair way to the upper stories. In the north-west corner of this building was another similar stair way. Opposite this was a room of the size of the guard room, after a few years occupied as the Post Office. All the other rooms on this story were in use as section rooms; one of these being also occupied as the Dialectic Hall, for the Dialectic Society was then in the full tide of success. I might detain you a half an hour in the description of the characteristics and peculiarities of its many fine debaters and writers, afterwards distinguished in military, religious and political life, and in anecdotes of the ridiculous first efforts of some, who by untiring industry and determination, eventually came to rank among the first, but I forbear. The upper stories were occupied by the first company of cadets. The rooms were large and each filled with five or six room mates. Some of the rooms were divided in two, by a thin board partition, one part a sleeping room and the other a parlor or study. On the prolongation westwardly of the south face of the North, was the front of the old South Barrack, with an interval of about fifty feet. This was also of stone, three stories. Each end furnished six sets of quarters quite small, each set divided into a bed room and sitting room. These with the exception of two, one in the East for the offices of the Commandant of Cadets and Adjutant, and one in the West as the Post Quartermaster's office, were occupied as officers' quarters, two officers in each set. In 1829-30 I with a room mate, occupied one set, and we were extravagant enough to buy a carpet for our parlor, the first, and for that year I think the only carpet which had ever been laid upon the floor of either barrack. The middle portion of this building, with a very narrow piazza on each story of each front, on to which all the rooms opened, was occupied by the second company of cadets. The rooms, very small, not one-third as large as those now in the new barracks, were in general each occupied by three cadets. There was hardly room enough to spread upon the floor the three narrow mattresses on which we slept, for in those days we had no bedsteads of any kind. The upper part of each door consisted of a window which had to be raised before the lower, or door proper part could be used. Many a bumped head and harsh word resulted from failing in the hurry of exit, to raise the upper part sufficiently. The rooms in both barracks were ventilated only by the doors and windows and a large fire-place, in which we made jolly fires in winter, and before which many a turkey was roasted for late suppers. Notwithstanding this, the rooms in the South Barracks were severely cold, and many a winter's night we were obliged to sit at our tables with blankets at our backs, scorching on one side and freezing on the other. To prevent danger from fires, each room was furnished with a large sheet-iron fender, which it was the duty of the person leaving the room, without an occupant, to place before the fire. This was the prolific source of reports of "fender not up" to the orderly, who could only shift it from his shoulders by seeking out the unfortunate fellow to whom the report really belonged. Fires, from neglect in this respect were frequent, though ever speedily extinguished by the prompt passage of leather buckets filled with water along an instantaneously formed line to the pump, one, the same as now existing, then just in front of the south entrance of the South Barrack, and the other from a large cistern in front of the North Barrack, usually filled with rain-water from the roofs. We had a small hand fire-engine, which was seldom required, and well drilled fire organizations. It was my lot to be captain of the fire company during my graduating year, but I never had my engine out for a real fire, except once. This happened in the winter of 1827-8. The post quartermaster had fitted up a hexagonal brick building, in later years known as "Castle Harris," and standing midway between the North Barracks and the river bank, for a new office. Finding that the chimney did not draw well, he had, in the West Point fashion, added several feet to its length by placing on the top a wooden parallelepipedon, which drew so well as soon to take fire itself. I had my well drilled company, and engine out in short order, and in double-quick time, rushed to the fire, but 'ere I could get my line formed from the pumps, the second of the candidates referred to in the fore part of this paper—the Militia Major—had contrived to get on top of the building and kicked over the chimney, parallelepipedon and all, effectually rendering further operations useless. A few weeks after this, that trip to "Benny's" closed his military career, and deprived the army of the services of as fine a soldier and as noble a man, as the best of us. Repairing to his home in Ohio, he became a successful and eminent physician and finally sacrificed himself by volunteering to attend the patients in the cholera hospital of the Ohio States prison, when other physicians refused. I was told that, only few months before his death, he made himself known to a common friend of ours, whom he had not seen for years and whose house he was approaching on a dark night, by repeating in a loud tone, without a miss, the roll of the company of cadets of which he had been orderly sergeant.

Directly west of the South Barracks, with its front on the same line, was another two story stone building of three distinct parts. On the lower story of the eastern part was a single large room, the Engineering Academy, containing the very few models of the department, a wooden truss or two, and the voussairs of two or three different kind of arches. In this room, the lectures to the class were given and the first section recited. Above this was another room, of the same size, used as the Post Adjutant's office and as an examination hall. The middle part, lower story, which projected a few feet beyond the other two, was the chapel, also used as a dancing hall, concert room, &c. This was furnished with good hard moveable benches, without backs or cushions or other upper supports, which increased in hardness very fast until the close of the usual hour and a half sermon of the good old chaplin of my first academic year. The same room was, after my graduation, sometimes used in June as an examination hall. Above this was the library. The lower story of the western part, of equal size and symmetrical with the eastern, was the Chemical Laboratory, with some apparatus and means of making experiments. In this were given the lectures on chemistry, and the sections in chemistry and mineralogy recited. Above this was the Philosophical Academy with a few pieces of poor apparatus. Here too the first section recited. We had no lectures in this branch. The building was burned in the winter of 1838. The fire took in the Engineering Academy, the contents of which, with most of the records, &c., in the Adjutant's office above, were consumed. The books and apparatus in the other two parts were saved.

Directly west of this, was the cadets' mess-hall, a long two story plain stone building. The west end was occupied by Mr. Cozzens, who for many years boarded the cadets at $10 each per month, (their monthly pay was $16 and two rations, in all $28.) He gave them excellent plain fare, surely we have never had on West Point such excellent bread and butter. I once heard him say, "Give young men plenty of first-rate bread, butter and potatoes, and they will require little meat, and never complain of that." Of course the mess-hall fare was much plainer than now, not near so much variety, but everything was neat, wholesome and well cooked. At this time the vast majority of cadets had lived no better at home, had not been accustomed to so many cakes and sugar plums, and seldom complained. Napkins, table-cloths, except at dinner, three-tined forks, &c., were not heard of in the mess-hall. Well do I remember, one year after my graduation, the astonishment of our officers' mess, at the introduction, by one of our number, somewhat aristocratic in his notions, for his own special use, of a three-tined silver fork.

After the purchase of Gridley's hotel, Cozzens' was the only public house on the Post, until the erection of the present hotel in 1829.

The foundations of nearly all the public buildings I have thus described you have doubtless often seen in times of drought.

The clump of elm trees, just in front of the quarters of the Professor of Engineering, shaded the front door of the part of the mess-hall occupied as a hotel. These trees appeared to my first sight as large as now. Under them the cadets, at times, had their public dinners on the 4th of July, previous to 1824. There is a little history regarding them which may be alluded to. They were, I understand, planted by General Swift, the first graduate of the Academy, while he was a cadet, about 1802, and consisted of two or three more than now. When Captain Partridge was acting as Superintendent, they had grown to nearly full size. One cold winter's morning Colonel Mansfield, the Professor of Philosophy, espied a man cutting away vigorously at a second, having already felled one of the largest. The Colonel rushed out and indignantly, in language more expressive perhaps, called out in substance, "Woodman, spare that tree." Upon learning that the man was obeying the orders of the Superintendent, he directed him to cease awhile. He went at once to headquarters, where he was informed that, true enough, the Superintendent had ordered the trees cut down for firewood! The colonel earnestly interceded for them, and by offering to advance money from his own pocket, sufficient to supply the pressing necessity, succeeded in saving them to this day.

Very near the sally-port of the present barrack stood the sutler's store and residence. The then sutler was John De Witt, a gentleman every inch, in fact and spirit, a descendent of one of the first Dutch settlers on the North River. His wife was one of the most beautiful and agreeable women I ever saw. They may be said to have been the leaders of the society here, at this time and for several years after my graduation. Hospitable, social and among the first in every good work. They reared a family of beautiful daughters two of whom married officers of the army. All of the estates below the Highland Falls, now owned by Messrs. Tracy, Pell and Morgan, were owned by Mr. De Witt at the time of his death.

Of the few buildings on the public lands south of the road in front of the barracks, which were standing when I came here not one is left, save that in which Lieut. Duvall now lives, occupied in 1824 by Professor Davies before his marriage. A little to the south and west of this, in what is now Professor Kendrick's garden, stood a yellow wooden house occupied by Major Leslie, paymaster of the Academy, and afterwards, on the completion of the quarters, in which the Professors of French and Spanish now live, in 1829, as younger officers' quarters. It was not torn down until 1836-7. The first house north was then, as now, the quarters of the Professor of Engineering, next the small school house, then the quarters of the Professor of Philosophy, now occupied by Colonel Mordecai, a single house and the first erected for the Professors. Next to this the old house known generally as Washington's headquarters, which were never occupied by him as such, but were then occupied by a very crabbed old gentleman, the military store-keeper, who was accustomed to use very harsh language to the cadets foraging on his fine cherries, which they often did before his face, being altogether too spry for him, in his feeble state. This office of military storekeeper was then a perfect sinecure, and was continued as such for many years after. The place was filled several times, as vacancies occurred, and only abolished after several reports, from Boards of Officers, that all the military stores, in its keeping, were utterly unserviceable and worthless. After its abolition, the house was at once assigned to Mrs. Thompson and her daughters. Next came the quarters, during my first year, of the Chaplain, but ever since of the Professor of Mathematics. Then the Superintendent's quarters, Commandant's quarters, and an old yellow house just west of Professor Michie's, occupied by the Quartermaster. The place on which Colonel Beaumont now lives was covered by a large clump of rocks 8 or 10 feet high, from which the stone for the Chaplain's, Professor Michie's and Professor Andrews' quarters was procured; then the quarters of the First Teacher of French and the Teacher of Drawing, now occupied by Professors Gardner and Larned. Just in front of Captain Ernst's present quarters, in the shade of that large elm tree, stood a very small wooden house occupied by a fat, jolly Quartermaster-Sergeant, who under the old regime, had picked up considerable money by participation in contracts for wood. On leaving West Point, he went to Canterbury and kept a large hotel, for many years quite popular there, and where the officers on their trips, into the country, always stopped for a good dinner. After this the house was occupied by young officers, for awhile by that splendid soldier, C. F. Smith. The rooms in it were so small that, it was said, he and one or two other tall fellows, had to go out of doors to put on their coats.

In its present elevated site stood, just as now, the monument a tribute to the memory of Colonel Wood, a graduate of the Academy, by his old commander General Brown. Below on the level spot beneath, north of the present road, were the shoemaker's and tailor's shops. This shoemaker was a character, Dutch, jocose and jovial, known to a vast majority of cadets, when speaking of him or to him respectfully, as "Mr. Midout Fail," more intimately as "Midout Fail" or simply as "Old Midout." For two years or more I never suspected that he might be entitled to any other name, or why this remarkable one, until one Saturday afternoon, upon urging the absolute necessity of my having a new pair of shoes by the following Tuesday, he replied, "you shall have them 'midout fail.'" He had a lively foreman too known, in the same fashion, as "Old step and fetch it" from his frequent promises to this effect.

On the south of the road, in the ground now appropriated to the ordnance buildings stood, in the south-west corner of the yard, the Post Office, in the southeast corner, a low cottage building covered, in season, with honeysuckles, roses and other flowers, and surrounded by flower-beds and shrubs innumerable, tastefully arranged and neatly kept, the abode of Mrs. Thompson and her three daughters. The same who for so many years occupied the old building near my quarters. These daughters were the gayest of the gay, present at every dance and entering into every social enjoyment of the post. The husband of Mrs. Thompson had been a revolutionary officer and captain of the Corps of Artillerists and Engineers, on duty here for many years, and upon his death, the widow was permitted, as a means of support, to keep twelve cadet boarders, furnishing them their meals only, a permission extended to the family by the successive Superintendents, until the death of the two youngest sisters about three years ago. These places were much sought after, a fact due not only to the excellent fare provided, but, doubtless, in a great degree, to the fondness of the young soldier for female society.

Did time permit I might say more of the virtues of this family and of the high regard in which they were ever held by the officers and professors of the Academy. One son was among its earliest graduates and fell gallantly fighting in the battle of Okee-cho-bee with the Seminoles in 1837. There were two other dwellings on this ground one occupied by the officer in command of a company of artillery stationed here.

On the North of the Point, near the site of the present hotel was located a long two-story building occupied by the company of artillery and called the "Bombardier barracks" as the soldiers went by the name of "Bombardiers." I do not know that they were ever called to bombard anything. On a cold winter's morning in 1827, about 2 o'clock, this building took fire, and before many cadets could get there, was burned to the ground. Those of us who were in time, did excellent service in carrying families of women and children in their beds, as they had slept, to the lawn in front of the burning mass. Before a line could be formed to the pump in front of the North barrack and I think before a single pail of water was thrown upon it, the whole building was in flames, and with nearly all its contents, save the men, their families, and the largest and most confused collection of large rats that I ever saw, was consumed, even the guns of the soldiers in the guard-room.

Under the north angle of old Fort Clinton, even at that time a ruin, on the rocks was a small house for many years occupied by Mr. Bryan Ward, the Adjutant's clerk, and father of the present Mr. Ward who was his immediate successor. You may see still growing there the remains of the lilacs which then bloomed profusely in the early spring.

The monument to Kosciuszko was not then in existence, though it had been designed by J. N. Latrobe, a cadet of high standing in the class of 1822, now a distinguished engineer and lawyer of Baltimore; and the cadets were contributing each twenty-five cents of his monthly pay toward the fund for its erection. It was completed in 1828-9, and a small surplus of funds, devoted to the marble basin now in Kosciuszko's garden. The cadets, at this time, were also required to contribute twenty-five cents per month each toward the support of the band.

Underneath the brow of the hill, a little south of the Dade monument, were located the quarters of Willis, then the leader of the band and the most celebrated performer on the Kent bugle in the world. The sweet notes of this bugle were heard every pleasant evening, for a long distance up and down and across the river, and were the admiration of both sailors and passengers of every passing vessel, many of which, especially the large packets crowded with the most respectable people of Newburgh and Poughkeepsie on their way to New York, were known to have cast anchor and remained for hours to give their occupants a chance to listen. Willis was not merely a performer, but distinguished as an arranger and composer of music. He composed several marches which were of high spirit and greatly admired and used throughout the country. As leader of the band, he was the band, as every part was arranged subordinate to his own. In these days of high science in music, I presume nearly every piece performed would be denominated a solo on the Kent bugle, by the whole band. I think you will scarcely find a graduate of these olden times, who will not insist, that the music of Willis' band, for military purposes, and in sweetness and harmony, far surpassed the more cultivated and artistic of the present day.

The plain, at this time, was much more rough and uneven than now, especially the part just south of the present camp ground, which was nearly covered with large rocks. These were gradually removed, except the large boulder now so prominent. This was spared only, at the solicitation of one of the early graduates, even after a laborer had commenced boring it for blasting, on account of its historic interest. It was for many years the habit of each succeeding graduating class, to form in procession, on the night preceding their relief from duty, with their drawing-boards, tables, &c., on their shoulders, and march to this rock upon which these articles, then their private property, were piled and set on fire, and around the brilliant flames, with hands joined and tuneful voices, the class would dance and sing until every article was consumed. Just north of the old North Barracks, on the most elevated part of the plain, was the parade ground for all class and undress parades and guard mounting. The dress parades were in front of the Superintendent's, as now.

The hollow north of the encampment was in those days much larger. It has been filled in gradually. Execution or "gallows hollow," as it was known to the old soldiers of the revolution, who had been stationed here and who had seen, as some have told me, men hung therein, was just as now, with its old stone ice-house, the only one on the post. In the angle in front of both the North and South Barracks, there was quite a hollow in winter, filled with water frozen, furnished excellent skating for the cadets. Another skating pond was in what is now the garden of the Superintendent, holding water nearly all the year. This pond, as a permanency, was spoiled by carting away the bottom of it to supply good soil to cover the remnant of rocks before alluded to in the chaplain's garden. On the north of the plain, and around to the library, I cannot call to mind that there was a single large tree. There were, here and there, a few cedars and shrubs. Of all the shade trees now presenting so fine an appearance, every one has been planted since 1824. Likewise with the grove of trees on the southern part of the plain, with the exception of three or four elms, one, the fine one now standing near the sally-port. Most of these were planted while I was a cadet, and the others since. Well do I remember the corps often rushing out, when it was announced that the bones of some revolutionary soldier, or some other relic, were thrown out by the planters of these trees, wondering and speculating, as crowds of grown men will, on scenes like these, the frequency of which demonstrated that this ground had been a well filled cemetery. The question has been often asked, why is it that most of these trees decay just at the lower limbs and many of them break off just here? Before they were planted every limb was carefully cut off and the tree itself at the top, and when planted they presented the appearance of so many well-trimmed bean poles. The top, as the new limbs started out around it, formed a small reservoir for the rain of years, which caused not only the rotting, but the shabby appearance of nearly all these trees at this point. This was the universal way of planting young trees in those old times. Well is it for the health and beauty of those more recently planted that the mode is now changed. On the western side of the plain, close to the professors' quarters, ran a white picket fence not farther from them than the width of the present piazzas. In front of this a wide gravel side-walk, on the outer edge of which was a row of fine young elms, now full grown. The two in front of my quarters were planted, as he has often told me, by the assistance of the late Professor Davies. In each yard were two or more large cherry trees, in season laden with forbidden fruit, a strong temptation, indeed, to those cadets whose ideas of "meum and tuum" were not firmly fixed. The roadway then covered not only the present one, but more than the present sidewalk in addition. On the eastern border of the road was a row of ugly Lombardy poplars, intermixed with young elms and maples.

I have often been asked whence or where the supply of water in these days? For the cadets—the pump now just north of the Academic Building, and when this gave out, as it did, now and then, the spring near the cavalry stables. For the Professors—several large springs of clear and sparkling water, at the foot of the hill in rear of our gardens. What has become of these springs I cannot tell. Two years ago, during our long drought, I sought some vestige of them and could find a few stones only, which marked the position of a single one. I leave the question to the geologist, who knows so much of the world before and after its creation, for answer. Water was not introduced into our houses at all, until 1826 or soon after, nor the first bath room until 1863 or '4. I assisted in making the survey for the difference of level between the present stone water-house, near the Delafield reservoir, and the plain, and the water from this house furnished the supply of nearly all the Point for many years. Its sources were the two large springs in the bottom of this reservoir, which until the reservoir was built, I never knew to fail to send forth a large stream of pure and living water.

I have in a rambling way, and with perhaps uninteresting detail, given you a description of the physical features of West Point in this olden time. He who would contrast them with those of the present, has but to take a morning's walk, of an hour or two, to see in their beauty and comfort, the many additions which have been made to this our lovely residence.

Having been fairly launched into the military service, I was kept with my class, daily increasing in numbers, until near the end of June before our examination for admission. In the meantime we were occupied about as now, in squad drill an hour and a half before breakfast, and the same time after 4, P. M., and in our room preparing ourselves, as best we could. Here in this room my mathematical aspirations received a sad shock. While studying with the Major, our lesson in arithmetic, which lessons by the way were daily recited to Dallas Bache, afterwards and for many years the distinguished scientist and superintendent of the U. S. Coast Survey, I announced to my room-mates the remarkable proposition, that in reducing the fraction  $\frac{2}{3}$  to an equivalent decimal, we were continually approaching the exact result, but would never get to it. "By King!" says the Major, and this was the only oath he was ever known to use, "that cannot be, if you continually approach a thing you must get to it some time or other." Argument, in the shape of Mathematical demonstration was in vain, and we agreed to decide the question, as is often done in more important matters, by a bet, the wager being two pounds of raisins, and to leave the decision to the first plebe who should enter the room. The first to come was he of the ruffled shirt, who had already developed so strong a partiality for me, that I was sure of a decision in my favor, but alas! as a famous New England poet has sung, with regard to a Connecticut Court,

"that, whoever came

With a good cause, good witnesses, good men,
Upon the bench as judges, and again,
With twelve good honest jurors; and
Had courage, after a dozen fights,
Would—stand an even chance to get his rights," my friend, after hearing with great gravity the arguments, patted me on the shoulder and said, "Church, you are wrong—the Major is right—you must pay the raisins." In after days when we had both attained a fair standing in mathematics, I asked him why he ad hrendered so absurd a decision. "Ah, I knew you had money and the Major had none. Had I decided otherwise we should have had no raisins." A reason quite as good and more definite than some given by higher Courts nowadays.

The requirements for admission in 1824 were simply Arithmetic, Reading and Writing. In arithmetic we received daily and very thorough instruction; our instructors being, generally, those cadets, who during the term had acted as assistant professors, receiving therefor ten dollars per month, and many extra privileges, including the important one of keeping a waiter. In this subject these instructors were able to form an approximate opinion in regard to those who were duly qualified, and as a consequence the examination of most of us in it was hurried and slight. To many not more than one or two questions were asked, while to those who were deemed doubtful much more time was given and their proficiency fully tested. We were required to read and write in the presence of the Academic Board. To the examination in reading more time was given than now, but in writing much less. Very few, comparatively, were rejected. Over one hundred of my class were admitted. At the January examination ninety-three were examined and about twenty found deficient and discharged. June left us with only fifty-four, and graduation with only thirty-three; nine of these having been turned back from the preceding class. From my recollection of my class-mates and from my experience and close observation since I am satisfied that our candidates, at that time and for a number of years after, were, in the three branches required, better prepared than those of later years. Why, I do not pretend to say, but I have strong opinions on the subject. Particularly do I think young men were better readers and spellers than now.

I would say, moreover, that this opinion is in no way founded upon the fact that more are rejected now than then.

My recollections of my first encampment appear to me quite vivid, and yet I call to mind nothing disagreeable, except the confinement and strict discipline. It is a wise arrangement of Providence that the tide of time washes from our memory the unpleasant things of our young life, and leaves for the pleasant thoughts of old age the recollections only of the more agreeable. We are encamped on the same spot now made so comfortable. Not a single shade tree near—not even sentry boxes for shelter in times of storm—no board floors, simply oil cloths to keep us from the dampness of the ground, a single ditch around the tent to drain the water. No wall tents or fly, except for officers. The corps was divided into four companies, as now. For my first two years the captains and lieutenants were detailed from the graduating class, as officers are now detailed for artillery. They wore the cadet uniform and took their meals with the cadets. The discipline of the camp was as strict as that of an army near an enemy. the duties of sentinels were required to be performed with the utmost strictness, A sentinel found sleeping on post was certain of dismissal, with no chance of restoration. There was no wheeling them off in wheelbarrows—no trifling with them in any way. There was no pulling out plebes by the heels or dousing them with water. We were drilled an hour before breakfast, an hour at artillery after guard mounting, an hour before dinner, and an hour and a half after 4, P. M., and so thoroughly that 'ere the close of the encampment, battallion drills were nearly perfected. We had the usual laboratory work, but none in practical engineering. On one occasion a careless fellow set fire to the rocket which he was making. The flames came up through the cracks in the floor where our class was making ball cartridges. I presume a room was never sooner vacated than that one, save by a single individual whom we met, as we returned, rushing down the stairs in great alarm. He had always been known by the prefix "late." No Germans, no hops, except those nightly improvised on some company parade ground, and these of country dances. We had our regular dancing lessons, our master for the whole four years, Papanti, the celebrated dancing master of Boston for nearly half a century. He was not called "Professor" in those days. His wife was a famous singer, and often gave concerts in the chapel. Here she first sang to us the tunes now classic at graduating parades. "The dashing white Sergeant," and "I see them on their winding way." She occasionally joined in our dancing lessons, much to our enjoyment, and during my cadetship, I think she was the only lady, with a single exception, who ever joined us in a dance at any time. This exception happened one evening of bright moonlight, in one of our country dances, when an officer, accompanied by a beautiful young lady from Albany, took his place at the head of the dance. The fact became instantly known in camp, and cadets from all the companies, joining at the foot, extended the line to the guard-tent. She bravely went through the whole 'ere she could get out of the scrape.

Our amusements in the evening, you see we had no time for them in the day, beside our dances, were to gather in small parties and listen to the stories of one or two particularly gifted in this way; the chief and best improviser of amusing stories was my friend of the ruffled shirt, who never failed to draw a crowd and raise a shout. I may part with him by the brief statement that, soon after graduation, he became a quartermaster in the army, and died early, in the wilds of Texas, with the reputation of being one of the best and most popular quartermasters in the service. Few cadets, scarcely any of the cadet officers, took the privilege of furlough, as it involved the loss of office and great expense and much time to reach their respective homes. As a consequence the number of cadets in camp was larger than now. The tents were struck on the 28th of August, and we marched to Barracks without a dream of a 28th ball, and ever as glad to march out, as we had been to march in.

The course of studies, at this time, was theoretically the same as now. The superintendent, Colonel Thayer, after the labor of years, had succeeded in organizing a course which he deemed best fitted for an American military education—a course calculated to cultivate the powers of thought rather than store the memory. This was a problem of no little difficulty. His experience in the French military schools and his extended acquirements made it one of deep interest to him and had prepared him for its solution. His guiding principle was thoroughness in everything—thorough teaching—thorough learning, and though these could only be attained after long experience, he laid a firm foundation for them, and to him, more than any other man, does the Military Academy owe that which is now the source of its great reputation, viz: its thorough teaching of a few rather than a smattering of many things. He rightly believed that a military education must be founded on a mathematical training and knowledge; hence he gave in the course that prominence which they have ever since retained, to Mathematics, Natural and Experimental Philosophy and Engineering.

Limited to four years in time, he could not, with his ideas of thoroughness in these important branches, and in such special military knowledge as he deemed particularly necessary to the educated soldier, do that which has been often and vainly attempted since, crowd into this time a greater part of the literary course of our colleges.

The modes of instruction too were entirely new and the text books very imperfect. The professors and teachers had themselves to learn the true use of the black board and the strict and detailed manner of demonstration, and in the first year or two of my time had, with, perhaps, a single exception, failed to imbibe the spirit which the Superintendent was, by personal exertion, striving to instil into all. The assistants were, at this time, mostly cadets of the higher classes, with their own lessons to study and entirely without experience.

In Algebra the best text book that could be obtained in the English language was a poor translation of Lacroix. In Geometry, though various editions of Euclid were in vogue, we had a translation of Legendre, really the foundation of our present text, but filled with inaccuracies and imperfections, not all of which have, to this day, been eliminated. In Trigonometry a translation of a work by Lacroix. In Descriptive a small work by Croz't, a French officer, graduate of the Polytechnic school, and who had been Professor of Engineering here. This contained only the elements, without application to the intersection of surfaces, or to warped surfaces. These, with the whole of shades, shadows and perspective, stone cutting and problems in Engineering, both civil and military, were given by lectures to the whole class by the respective professors. Notes were taken by the cadets, the drawings made in our rooms before the next morning, then presented for examination and at once recited upon, previous to the following lecture. You will understand how this could all be done, when I tell you that in the departments of Mathematics, Philosophy and Engineering the sections, of over twenty cadets each, were kept in three hours daily. Of course the real teachers in these subjects were those cadets who made careful notes, finished their drawings early in the day, made the demonstrations to their class-mates and lent their drawings for copying. Great skill was acquired in making these copies. A clear and large pane of glass was placed on the top of the wash-stand, a lighted candle underneath, the finished drawing on the glass, and the paper for the copy on top, and every point quickly marked with a pencil. Several copies of the same drawing were thus made. Of course, the number of drawings made by each cadet was much greater than now. I think I had over fifty full sheets.

In the Third class we had, in the higher sections of Analytical Geometry, Biot's work on this subject in French—a work scarcely surpassed since. In the lower, a small English work, the name of which I have forgotten. In the Calculus the higher sections had, also in French, the work of Lacroix, which all my pupils know I still regard as the best model on the subject, and the lower, an inferior work by Boucharlat, also in French. In the drawing department the drawings were confined to crayon drawings of the human face and figure, to landscape drawings with the pencil, and topography with the pen—no drawings in colors. The third class attended two hours every other week day, except Saturday, and the second every week day.

In the French department, as Colonel Thayer regarded the language only as a means of opening to the student the scientific works of Europe, every important one of which was sure to be published in French, no pains were taken to teach it as a means of conversation. A good knowledge of the grammar, a thorough knowledge of the verbs, (these only were written in detail on the black-board) and a full translation from French into English were all that was required. The text books were Berard's French grammar and Leçons Françaises by the first teacher of French, a work which "Revisée corrige et considerablement augmente" was retained until within a few years, Gil Blas and L'Histoire de Charles the 12th. The Fourth class recited every week day, except Saturday, and the Third every week day. The heads of the Departments of both Drawing and French were teachers with the pay of captain. They were not made professors until 1846. There were two teachers of French, first and second.

Our course of Philosophy with its text books was very imperfect. Then as now it was regarded the most difficult of all. Gregory's Mechanics, a very poor English work, and a few propositions from Newton's Principia which was a special pet of our Professor, furnished the first section all of our Mechanics. A work, by Bridge, in which the subject was treated geometrically, did the same service for the lower sections; and Enfield's Philosophy gave us a part of our knowledge in Electricity and all of our Optics and Astronomy, the latter subjects being treated geometrically. We had little apparatus. I remember well a tall Atwood's machine standing in one corner of the philosophical room, but never saw it put to any use—a cycloidal pendulum, with which we used to amuse ourselves when the professor was late coming in, and a formidable array of brass pulleys with a green silk cord. The only attempt at an experiment, which I remember to have seen in the course, was with this pulley machine. After having finished a very satisfactory recitation on the properties of pulleys, the professor proposed to impress the principles upon our minds by illustrating the fact, which we had triumphantly demonstrated, that a very small weight would raise a very large one. Having arranged the machine to his satisfaction, he carefully put on the small weight, but without effect. He shook the machine a little to start it, when away went the small weight up to the ceiling. "Oh, ho!" says he quietly, "something out of order here," and dismissed the section. You may believe we went down the stairs with a shout. To arrive at a very small amount of knowledge, I believe we had to study harder than it is necessary to acquire the much more extended course of to-day.

In chemistry we had an excellent text book in Webster's Chemistry, first used here, I think, by our class. We also had many highly interesting lectures and beautiful experiments, illustrating every part of the course.

There was at this time no professorship of Chemistry, Mineralogy, &c. The course had been introduced by regulation, and Assistant Surgeons of the Army were detailed as acting professors. When I came, the poet James G. Percival occupied this position. He had been specially appointed an assistant surgeon that he might fill the place. He did not find it congenial to his tastes, and held it only a few months. He was succeeded by Doctor Torrey, a distinguished chemist and botanist, who was also specially appointed an assistant surgeon for this purpose. He was succeeded in 1827 by Lieut. Hopkins, a graduate of 1825, and his successor in 1835 was Lieut. J. W. Bailey, a graduate of 1832, even then giving great promise of the high reputation which he afterwards attained. He held the position until the professorship was created by law in 1838, and was then appointed to fill it.

In the First class our text books in the course of Engineering were still more imperfect. In civil, a work in French, by Sganzin, a French engineer of reputation, very diffuse and with difficulty comprehended. There was a translation of this in English by a young officer of the army, which some used as what is now called a "pony," but only to carry them into greater difficulties. In military engineering and the art of war we had a still poorer translation of a work by Gay de Vernon, a distinguished French writer, the study of which was rather a matter of fun than of profit. It was translated at the expense of the Government, and hundreds of copies, now useless, may be found on the shelves of our Library; in fact, we had to pick up most of our knowledge in these subjects from the lectures of our Professor. We went through Murray's large grammar on a gallop of thirty or forty pages to a lesson, a hasty general review for those who previously knew it, but of no earthly use to those who knew it not. Paley's Moral Philosophy, including a system of practical ethics, was thoroughly taught to our class, though if the section did not know the lesson well, some mischievous fellow had only to start our new Professor, Warner, on some pet question of his, and he would talk the hour out, much to our profit on this particular point. We took great interest in Kent's lectures, then just published, on both International and Constitutional Law and learned them well. Infantry Tactics were then taught in the First class and thoroughly from a work by General Scott. The lessons of every section were heard by the Commandant of Cadets and were repeated by himself on drill. He was thus familiar with the merits of every member of the class. The Artillery Tactics and Ordnance and Gunnery were all taught, without assistance, by the Instructor of Artillery. The course of Ordnance and Gunnery was quite imperfect. Every artillery drill was conducted by the same officer and all target practice. We had no horses to draw the pieces, but had to draw them ourselves, thus being able to perform only a single manœuvre where now five or six can be well performed.

A short course of Mineralogy, with Cleveland as a text, was also taught in the first class by a Lieutenant of Artillery. This officer, we thought, did not take great interest in the matter, and was quite easy with us. We soon found out his equation, from which we could easily ascertain the order in which the members of the section would be called each day, and as he invariably gave to the first one called the first principal subject in the lesson, to the second the second, and so on, we calculated very accurately what each one would have to recite upon. Of course we paid very little attention to the other parts of the lesson, the very natural consequence of which was that when we came to prepare for the examination, we knew very little of the science. The evening before we were to be examined, after hard study to make up this deficiency with the class-mate next above me on the roll, I said jokingly, "You know best the subject of copper, but I am perfect on graphite. If I get graphite, even though you get copper, I shall rise you." After taking our seats in the examination hall, Colonel Thayer directed the instructor to begin at the foot of the section—we were not sent to the board on these subjects, but were simply questioned at our seats. He did so, and commencing at the first, gave out in order the principal subjects without omitting one. I was in despair as I saw that he was coming towards a locality in which I only knew that neither graphite nor copper occurred. As my turn came I observed that Colonel Thayer made a remark to him, which I learned afterwards was to the effect that as he was going on he would not get over one quarter of the course. You may be assured I brightened up as I heard the words, "Mr. Church, you may describe the nature and properties of graphite." He had turned over one hundred pages of the text. Having occupied my five minutes to his entire satisfaction, he passed to the next, and turning over a number of pages more, he gave him the subject of copper. He too did well, but I rose him. I knew from a conversation with my instructor a few months after, that this was absolute luck. Now here is a problem in complex probabilities which would puzzle the best actuary in the land.

Compare the entire course thus described with the present, and note the marked improvements, both in regard to the amount of matter and facilities of instruction and acquiring. Well may the cadet of the present day congratulate himself upon the possession of advantages like these.

The classes were organized into sections for recitation much as now. The only exception of importance I think was in the organization in September of the fourth class in French. This class was, on the last days of August, carefully examined by the first teacher, in English grammar, Latin and French and arranged accordingly. Those who had studied French, only a few, were sure to go into the first section. I got my place there, by what Mr. Berard was pleased to call an excellent examination in Latin. I had never seen a French book. Once there, it was difficult to get one out, as transfers were few except as the result of after examination. An anecdote may illustrate. The Second Teacher of French, a good French scholar but not much of a teacher, and as, in former years, was always the case in this department, having no idea of the importance of a proper arrangement of the entire class, had occasion to be absent for a few days and his sections, in the lower half of the class, were heard by the first Teacher. He found in them several who were manifestly better than some of his first section and had them transferred. Learning what had been done, the second Teacher went in great excitement to the Superintendent, to make an official complaint, and said, "Col. Thayer, while I was absent, Mons. Berard has heard my section, and Sir, he has transferred up my best men. Yes Sir, my very best men." I doubt whether the Col. with all his suavity was ever able to appease him.

The hours for recitation also were the same, except in Mathematics, Philosophy and Engineering. The sections in these were kept three hours except those instructed by cadets. These instructors were obliged to dismiss their sections a half an hour before eleven, so as to go to their own recitations. The professor heard the first section only, and though the regulations required him, occasionally to change sections, in rotation with his assistants, this was seldom done. The Superintendent often visited the sections and made himself familiar with the mode of instruction and extent of knowledge of every teacher. A warm dispute between a professor and his first assistant, before the Academic Board, in regard to finding a cadet deficient, whom the former had never heard recite, except at examinations, and whom he did not personally know, was the direct cause of the present custom, which gives to the head of every department the opportunity to hear frequently every section of his class. The weekly marks, kept and recorded as at present, though the range was from  $+3$  down to  $-3$ , were not made public. The names of two or three, distinguished as best and worst in each section, were regularly put up in the guard room on Sunday, and great was the rush to see them. If a cadet desired to know what his mark was, he had to go to the Superintendent, who kept the record on his table, and with condescending dignity would give him the required information, but no means of comparing himself with other members of the section. Permits for excuses from duty and other favors were presented in person, and it has been facetiously remarked that a microscopic examination of the permit in the hand of the portrait in the Library will, doubtless, show it to be one to receive certain articles from the store, all of which are erased, except a cake of soap and a fine tooth comb.

Examinations too were different. In January they began at 8, continued till 1; and then from 2 P. M. until dark. In June they began before breakfast, occupying an hour or more—then from 8 to 1, and from 2 until parade. They were all before the whole Board, which included the Assistant Professors of Mathematics, Philosophy and Engineering. The Superintendent scarcely left the hall for a moment—marked carefully every one examined, and took a most active part in the arrangement of every roll. Cadets about the head of the class were often under actual examination one hour and a half, particularly in June, and those of doubtful proficiency were examined with great strictness, until all doubts were solved. The other members of the class got off easily. Professors in other departments often put questions. I was nearly taken off my feet at my fourth class examination in Mathematics by a series of questions put to me by the Professor of Engineering on my Descriptive problem, which I had never heard or thought of before. In the departments of Philosophy and Engineering the first five or six of the class knew very well the subjects which they were to have at the Board, not from any connivance or direct information, but from the habits of the professors. In June I expected a proposition in Enfield's Philosophy, which I knew had been given out either to the second or third man for two or three years immediately preceding. I carefully prepared myself on it—got it and made no discreditable show. In Engineering, on graduating, for several years in succession a famous descriptive problem on defilement had been given out to the one who held my place. I had during the term demonstrated it more than twenty times to members of my class. To my astonishment

I was given only the first half of it, on which I did my best, and after an hour's examination took my seat with flying colors. The other half, to the great surprise of all, was given to the fifth on the list, who had specially prepared on another proposition, but fortunately knew it well and was highly complimented also. One or two others failed in their calculations, and did not get off so well. I rather think Colonel Thayer was getting his hand into the matter, and the following year all such calculations miserably failed.

In arranging the standing there was no roll proposed before the examination; the marks of the term were the only indication of merit laid before the Board. The examination of a section being complete, before another one was called up, its instructor proposed his choice for No. 1—the merits of the individual were fully canvassed and the vote taken. If in the negative, he proposed another, or if he preferred not, some other member did, and so on until the entire section was arranged. In cases of doubt it often happened that several were placed equal. All the sections being thus arranged, transfers were proposed by any member of the Board, and in order that the instructor of the section might act intelligently, he was required to be present at the examination and mark each member of the sections next to his. After this the Head of the Department, as now, proposed those whom he considered deficient. Notwithstanding all this care, I cannot say that the rolls were arranged any more accurately than at the present day. Its advantage was to place really the responsibility for the rolls upon the entire Board, rather than upon the Department.

For the purposes of military discipline in barracks the corps was divided into two companies, officered nearly as now; Captains, Lieutenants, and Orderly Sergeants were taken from the first class; other sergeants from the second, and corporals from the third. There were but two Assistant Instructors of Tactics. These had their quarters in barracks with the cadets. I do not think the term "officer in charge" was then known, as both were constantly in charge. I do not think either of them, except when acting as commandant, had power to grant any permits, or to excuse from any duty. All this power was executed by the Superintendent, except, in some few simple cases, by the Commandant. The discipline was very strict. Cadet officers reported as freely and as conscientiously as the Assistant Instructor of Tactics. Cadets were in general very orderly and studious, and there was very little dissipation. Proof of use of intoxicating drinks, or having them in quarters, was sure to bring dismissal, with little or no chance of restoration. Attendance upon religious services was strictly enforced, both upon officers and cadets. Two or three years after my graduation, three officers on duty here remonstrated against this regulation, claiming their constitutional rights. The paper was forwarded at once to Washington, and an answer was soon returned, in substance, that the Secretary of War was farthest from any desire to interfere in the least with their conscientious scruples, and would, therefore, send them where attendance upon Divine service would not be deemed necessary; and ordered them to their posts. This was much to their disgust. It was thought that there was not much conscience in the matter any way.

Delinquencies and demerit abounded then, as now, but there was no special punishment, except for offences acted upon by Courts Martial. Neither was there, until 1831 or '2, any limit of demerit, beyond which required dismissal. When this was first established, an insubordinate cadet, claiming to have great personal influence with the President, openly set it at defiance, with the avowed purpose of breaking it up. Having received over his 200, he was recommended for dismissal, and was dismissed, in spite of all his influence, just as he was about to graduate, and never received either diploma or commission. No other cadet, not deficient in something else, tried this game for a number of years. The effect of this regulation upon the discipline of the corps was excellent.

The system of acting upon excuses was different from what it is now. All academic delinquencies—that is absences from recitations and misconduct in the section rooms, were only reported on the weekly class reports, and went directly to the Superintendent and could be excused by him alone. They were only published weekly. All others were published daily and went to the Commandant. Excuses were rendered to him personally, not in writing. With the abstracts before him, he sat as judge every morning, hearing such as were made, asking such explanations as he thought necessary, and if satisfied, erased the report in the presence of the cadet. If not satisfied, he so informed the delinquent, and left him to make a written appeal to the Superintendent, through the Commandant. I must say that I think the present plan has no advantages over the old. I have ever thought that its tendency has been to create “quibbling” often aided, if not suggested by others, which could not well take place in the face to face interview with the commandant. The former mode, too, brought the cadets more directly in contact with the commandant, who could not fail thus to become acquainted, not only with the persons of the cadets, but with the peculiarities and characteristics of each.

The uniform of the corps was very nearly as now. The cloth pantaloons were trimmed down the sides with black silk braid and an Austrian knot in front. No uniform overcoat was prescribed, and in stormy weather we wore any kind we pleased. Such a mixture of Scotch plaid and camel cloaks and cloth surtouts was, probably, never elsewhere seen on any parade. For my first two years each cadet had his hair cut to suit his own fancy. The first order requiring it to be cropped in the present mode created great excitement and disgust. The A's were to have it cut on the first of each month, the B's on the second, and so on through the Alphabet. After the first four or five days a full sheet drawing was laid upon the table of the Commandant in his office just before office hours. Scene—Interior of the barber's shop. In the barber's chair sat a cadet, every lock of hair but one cut close to his head, that one in the jaws of the shears, the genteel Spencer and doomed victim looking with mute, but earnest appeal to Major Worth, the Commandant, who, in full uniform and with drawn sword pointed at the two, was uttering, "cut it off, sir." Before the glass stood a cadet, who with comb and brush had stepped up to give his hair, as usual, a finishing touch, but with horror in his face and outstretched arms, comb flying in one direction and brush in the other, was uttering "Alas, not a single hair left." In the corner of the room was a heap of hair which Joe Simpson was stuffing into a bag, with the remark "Fine time this for the wig makers in New York." The drawing was admirably done and the likenesses excellent. A listener in the Adjutant's office to the conversation and merriment of the Commandant and his two assistants heard the former say, "There are only two men in the corps capable of doing that," mentioning the names. The fact is, it was done by these jointly, one of whom was my room mate. No notice was otherwise taken of the picture. After graduation I made many enquiries, but could never learn anything about it.

The principal officers, professors and instructors on duty at the academy, a part or all of the time, of which I write, were:

1. COLONEL THAYER, Superintendent, of whom I may say, at the risk of some repetition, that the three years immediately following my graduation were passed under his administration, at its maximum of prosperity. With the warm support of the authorities at Washington, he had organized and was executing a system of discipline and a course of instruction which are essentially the same as to-day, and to which the Military Academy owes its usefulness and success. This course of instruction has been, in some respects, improved—the thoroughness of individual teaching made more complete—the means of communicating information much enlarged and better applied, but after all, these are but the natural growth of that which he planted, for which he labored and of which he foresaw the results. In fact he left to his successors little to do, save rightly to administer that which his mind had conceived and almost fully developed. It was notorious that he was the earliest riser on West Point, and often have the sleepy eyes of a cadet, at reveille, opened wide to see him on his morning walk.

The out-door work of the Academy was little then, compared with what it is now, and his hours were spent mostly in his office, in the study of the various courses which he had prepared, and the examination of such reports as gave him a full insight into the character, capacity and daily habits of every cadet before he had been here three months. In the little reception office before alluded to he often astonished his cadet visitor with accurate knowledge of his personal affairs and acts, which he supposed no one but himself could know. With all his strictness and apparent coldness on duty, he had a heart as big as breast could hold, and often was he known to interpose a saving hand for the youth who through thoughtlessness had committed an offence, by regulations entitled to the severest punishment, when his knowledge of character and absence of vicious motive told him that there was in this youth that which might do honor to his country and make him worthy of a favor. Was not this goodness of heart and uprightness of purpose the cause that every graduate under him admired and respected and so many loved him?

2. PROFESSOR DAVIES, then young, enthusiastic, energetic; a clear and logical demonstrator and an admirable teacher. He had at once imbibed the spirit and fully sympathized in the desires of the Superintendent and labored earnestly to carry them out, in building up a logical system of instruction and recitation, which required not only a thorough understanding of the details of and reasons for everything proposed, but a clear, concise and complete examination of it.

3. PROFESSOR MAHAN, my first instructor in Algebra and Descriptive Geometry, then just graduated, and already, it was said, selected by Col. Thayer as the future Professor of Engineering. He was then laying the foundation of that reputation which he soon after acquired and for so many years sustained. The following year he was specially ordered to France to study in its military schools; whence he returned in 1830 to take the professorship for which he had thus prepared.

4. LIEUT. ROSS, my immediate predecessor as principal assistant pro fessor, eccentric, emphatic, clear in explanation, and a first-rate instructor of the higher sections, one of which always fell to his charge, but with little patience and less success with the lower. He was a first lieutenant of Artillery, and for many years at the head of the list, vainly waiting for a captaincy. He resigned and became the Professor of Mathematics in Kenyon college, in Ohio, and afterwards in the Free Academy, now the College of New York. While here as assistant professor in 1831 he translated Bourdon's Algebra, and this translation is the foundation of our present Davies Bourdon.

5. MR. BERARD, the First Teacher of French, then, as ever, the fine scholar, the thorough gentleman, and an excellent instructor of his own sections to which he was entirely devoted. He was very popular with the cadets and much respected by all.

6. MR. GIMBREDE, Teacher of Drawing, handy with his pen, crayon and pencil, but not particularly a successful instructor. From the common pronunciation of his name, many cadets supposed it to be "James Brede," and that he was familiarly called "Jim." Some thinking to be more respectful would address him as "Mr. Brede," much to his indignation and to their utter discomfiture.

7. PROFESSOR MANSFIELD, of Philosophy, at my time was very old, yet quite enthusiastic in his branch of study, generally a mere listener to demonstrations, complimentary to a good one, but coldly silent to a bad one. He was the first professor of Philosophy here, and while holding this place, was sent as Surveyor-General of the North-western Territory, and devised and carried into execution the present simple plan of the survey of our public lands. The boys used to "paper it" badly with him, and I fear few learned much of their course. He was greatly loved and respected by all. The first section of my class was the last he taught and we caused his portrait to be painted by Sully and deposited in the library of the academy. The book in his hand is a true portrait of the copy of Newton's Principia, which he used in the section room; and I here wish to put on record the fact that that portrait belongs to the first section of the class of 1828, and not to the Military Academy.

8. DR. TORREY, Acting Professor of Chemistry, who was specially appointed an assistant surgeon in the army for this purpose, was an able, clear and eloquent lecturer. He made the subject exceedingly interesting by his many beautiful and instructive experiments and apt illustrations.

9. PROFESSOR DOUGLASS, of Engineering, had the reputation of being an able engineer and a fine scholar, yet he was by no means a clear demonstrator. His style was diffuse, and there was a great want of logical sequence in his language. Most of the course of engineering, all of that which was illustrated by drawings, was given to the class by him from the black-board. He was afterwards the Chief Engineer of the Croton water-works for supply of water to the city of New York and made the plans, surveys and estimates for them.

10. PROFESSOR MCILVAINE, for two years Chaplain and Professor of Ethics, &c., came here a young man with a high reputation. His sermons from the pulpit were delivered with unsurpassed eloquence, and listened to by all with the greatest interest and attention. His manner was persuasive—his matter logical and convincing. He first delivered to the Cadets the able series of lectures on the evidences of Christianity, which were afterwards publicly delivered in New York and published in 1831. These lectures and his earnest preaching resulted, in the winter of 1826, in a great religious excitement here, both among officers, professors and cadets. Prayer and conversational meetings were daily held for a long time and fully attended, and many openly avowed their conversion and joined the church, among whom were some who, after graduation, became able, eloquent and prominent ministers of the Gospel.

11. PROFESSOR WARNER, the immediate successor of Bishop McIlvaine, a scholar of fine attainments and a high order of intellect, a man who, but for his indolence, would have made a mark in the world. He loved to talk, and nothing pleased him more than to do all the recitation for his pupils. The opening question of the lesson was a text upon which he often occupied the recitation hour, by no means unprofitably, for his explanations were concise and clear, and his illustrations apt and to the point. Few failed to profit by his teaching, though many took advantage of the opportunity thus afforded to neglect the study of the lesson in quarters.

12. MAJOR WORTH, a true soldier—a strict disciplinarian—an excellent tactician. In the section room he was as prompt and concise as in the field. In all my experience here I have never seen the corps as well drilled as under him. His word of command was electric, and there was a uniformity and accuracy of motion of those under this command, which I have never seen equalled.

13. LIEUT. KINSLEY, as Instructor of Artillery, Ordnance and Gunnery, thorough—at artillery drill accurate and energetic, so close an observer, that after two or three drills he could call every one present by name, and was thus never at a loss whom to report for the least violation of regulations where ever occurring.

From 1818 to 1838 there was a special paymaster of the Academy. He also acted as Treasurer. The place was filled for the whole time by Major Leslie, an officer of Engineers. He made no payments, except at the Academy, until he was transferred to the pay department. The clerk of the Treasurer and the personal clerk of the Superintendent during the whole of this time and for many years after, until he was made Commissary of Cadet supplies, was Mr. Timothy O'Maher, without whose name the early history of West Point and some of its later would be imperfect. As a clerk he was a neat writer, honest and accurate. As a close observer, in his later years, he knew personally more officers of the army than any other man, and more of their characteristics while cadets. He seldom forgot a face or name, even after many years. A few years before his death he solved for me the problem which we could never solve. "How Colonel Thayer knew so much about the personal affairs of each cadet?" by telling me that he, monthly and weekly, if necessary, prepared memoranda of all important matters relating to them, such as amount of debt—marks, demerit, &c., which were pasted upright in deep pigeon holes of the Colonel's desk on his table, out of sight of others. Into these he had but to cast a glance and say, if desirable, "No, sir, you are so much in debt." "You have so much demerit," &c. He was moreover a humorist of the highest order and would have made a distinguished actor. A story that he often told of a notorious character here for many years, a man who used to work in our gardens and run on errands for the officers, was as good as a play. This man, Paul by name, could not begin his daily work until he had his daily dram. This he could not well get without a trip to the Falls, and through wind and storm he always went for it. One spring morning, before sun rise, as he was wending his way along the foot path, now covered by the main road, he heard a noise in the field on the right, just before you reach the Kinsley mansion, and looking saw in the very act a bluish gray dog killing one of Mrs. Kinsley's sheep. Knowing that having lost several in this way, she had offered a reward of five dollars to any one who would give her reliable information of the owner of the dog, Paul deemed his fortune made, and rushed to the house and reported the facts, and that the blue dog, to his certain knowledge, belonged to Mr. O'Maher, as it did. Mrs. Kinsley paid the reward, and Paul had a nice time, without work, for several days. She at once ordered her side saddle to be put on her horse, and over she went to Cornwall, engaged a lawyer, and soon a writ was served on Mr. O'Maher. He fearing, as well he might, that he would have to pay for all the mutton thus sacrificed in these mountains for a year, went for the opposing lawyer at Cornwall, stated the case, admitting that the dog described was his, but expressing a strong desire to escape so heavy a penalty. Says the lawyer, "what kind of a man is this Paul?" O'Maher described him to a fraction. "Well," says the lawyer "He is evidently too honest to accept a bribe and then bribery is dangerous in such a circumstance as this. Go to him, slip a ten dollar bill into his hand, tell him that after carefully considering the matter you rely upon him to tell the truth,—and let it work." The day of trial came, Paul the only witness was on hand, and on the stand being duly sworn, stated the facts exactly as they occurred, until he said, "I saw a large red dog killing the sheep." "Red dog!" says the plaintiff's lawyer, "the defendant's dog! Oh no, the defendant's dog is a blue dog. But did you not state to Mrs. Kinsley that it was a blue dog, and the defendant's dog?" "Oh yes, I did." "How happens it then that you state so differently now?" in great anger says the lawyer. "Oh," says Paul, pressing down, with his little finger, the tobacco in his pipe, "I was not under oath at the time." No after questioning could disturb the equanimity and innocence with which he smoked his pipe, and the intelligent jury gave a verdict for the defendant. Mrs. Kinsley paid the costs, and O'Maher a heavy fee. His acting and mimicry of his honest witness cannot be portrayed here. They were inimitable.

Among the cadets in the corps with me many were distinguished in after life. I may mention A. D. Bache, before referred to, Thompson S. Brown, Chief Engineer of the New York and Erie R. R., and consulting engineer, in the service of the Czar of Russia, of the St. Petersburg and Moscow R. R. Gen. Robert Anderson, Gen. C. F. Smith, Professor W. H. C. Bartlett, Gen. Albert S. Johnston, who was Adjutant of the Corps in his graduating year, and a splendid adjutant too, Rev. Martin P. Parks, Chaplain and Professor of Ethics here for several years, afterwards an assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York, Bishop and Gen. Leonidas Polk, Jefferson Davis, Charles Mason, Chief Justice of the Territory of Iowa, and afterwards Commissioner of Patents, Gen. Robert E. Lee, Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, Gen. O. McN. Mitchell, Rev. Francis Vinton and Gen. A. A. Humphreys, Chief of Engineers.

One of the most remarkable events of my time was the visit of Gen. Lafayette in September, 1824. He came in a steamboat from New York, accompanied by other boats crowded with people. With him were a large number of the Society of the Cincinnati, a host of militia officers, the Common Council of the city of New York, and many distinguished citizens from all the river towns. He was received here by Colonel Thayer, aided by Generals Brown and Scott, reviewed the Corps of Cadets and witnessed the drill with many commendations. A grand dinner was given in the cadets' mess hall and the day was truly a gala one.

When I first came to the Academy, it was the custom for the cadets to give a 4th of July dinner, to which the professors and officers were invited. At these dinners wine flowed freely and toasts were drunk in bumpers. As a very natural consequence, many of the cadets, as was the habit at most public and many private dinners in these days, became grossly intoxicated and the dinner usually broke up in considerable of a row. On the 4th of July, 1825, the dinner was more than usually joyous, and ended by the cadets carrying Major Worth to camp on their shoulders, and a jolly, as well as boisterous time they had that night. This I believe was the last of the dinners. Col. Thayer, who, it was thought, winked at them by always absenting himself from the post on this day, was too much dissatisfied with the reports of this last proceeding, and winking no longer, put his veto on them.

In the fall of 1825 occurred the refusal of the second and third classes to go to drill. The regulations then limited the drills to a time ending October 31st. The weather at this time was very pleasant, and probably from forgetfulness Major Worth had failed to issue the usual order to discontinue them. On the 1st of November the bugle sounded as usual, and most of the three upper classes appeared and answered to their names. Before the order was given to march off, many left the ranks, and the drill (in Artillery) was thus broken up. An order was issued the same evening that the drill would take place next afternoon. Consultations were held by the second and third classes, and, with three exceptions, all bound themselves to sustain each other and not to appear on the drill. At the call only the three excepted appeared, and as the first class were there only to act as officers, of course there was no drill. The officers of the second class were all arrested and reduced to the ranks, and others of the class equally guilty were appointed in their stead. These refusing to accept, the vacancies were filled from the first class. Of these thus refusing two were selected and tried by general court martial and sentenced to be dismissed; but in view of the circumstances, no doubt of the direct violation of the regulations by the authorities of the Academy, the sentence was commuted to a deprivation of "the privilege of going to public parades with their fellow cadets," a punishment so ridiculous, that Colonel Thayer wrote at once and had it remitted. All others were released, and thus ended the matter.

On Christmas eve 1826, occurred one of the most violent outbreaks ever known at the Academy. A large number of the cadets got on a spree and became excessively riotous, setting all officers at defiance, and even with a drawn sword chasing one to his room—throwing missiles through the halls, breaking windows and the railings of the stairs, &c. The scene, as described to me two days afterwards, was fit for Bedlam. I was absent on a Christmas leave, and knew of this scene only as I was told. A Court of Inquiry kept long in session, and, examining nearly every cadet in the corps, developed all the facts, and a large number of cadets were dismissed. Three of “the five” in my class were among the victims.

The 1st of July, 1828, found me in my Yankee home, enjoying a respite from four years of hard study, with my diploma and commission as Brevet 2d Lieutenant of Artillery and a notice that I was to be detailed for duty at the Academy as an assistant professor of Mathematics. Accordingly on the first of September following I was duly quartered with a class mate in the north-east corner of the South Barracks, lower floor; the coldest room in the building, just opposite the Commandant’s office, close to the sounding of all the calls, and to the preliminary formation of all parades, with confusion enough to drive all thoughts of study from our heads. We were, however, both young and earnest, and ere the lapse of a week had formed our plans for a course of study and exercise, which, in the main, I strictly kept up for the three following years.

First, and above all, a few specified hours of each day were systematically devoted to the thorough study not only of the lessons which we were to teach on the following day, but to whatever else, beyond the text, was closely connected with them. Second, a few to the critical reading of Ancient and English history and the study of English literature, and the remaining time to the study of law, a profession to which we were both inclined. The detail of several members of my class so increased the number of officers here, that nearly all of the cadet assistants were dispensed with. Among the assistants at this time and for three years after there was not a married officer. We messed at Mr. Cozzens’ very pleasantly for nearly a year and a half, at fifteen dollars each per month, I think. The pay of a second lieutenant then, including the commutation of the rations, &c., was about sixty dollars per month.

During these three and for many years after the manners and customs of the society at the Point were primitive and simple. There were many private parties, very social and pleasant, and to which all were invited. The invitations were, generally, in the hand-writing of the lady giving the party, and named particularly the hour of assembling, usually seven or half-past, and at this hour, as if upon beat of drum, the guests arrived. The entertainments were plain and inexpensive. The dancing always ending with the Virginia reel, consisting mainly of quadrilles, Spanish dances and an occasional waltz, and in which young and old joined, was lively and joyous. Polkas, Schottisches, Mazourkas, &c., were then unknown here; and by half-past ten or eleven all were again at home, and most in bed, as honest people should be. For the first year I do not remember a single public ball. The second we had a grand one for the warming of the new hotel when it was first opened, and several afterwards. At these we imported many young ladies from Newburgh, Poughkeepsie, &c., and kept later hours. I do not know when the cadets began to have their 28th balls, they were not called hops at first. I think they began in 1834. I do not think there was a family on the Point that dined later than 1 o'clock, P. M. Dinner parties were given at later hours, but always ended before dark.

The fact that I was studying law, I suppose, led to my frequent detail as recorder and Judge Advocate of Courts Martial. We had little to guide us in the duties, except a work on Courts Martial by General Maccomb and our own experience. One of my earliest cases was somewhat remarkable. One of the soldiers, a German, was charged with stealing one of Mr. Cozzens' pigs. I was told by the Adjutant that the evidence in the case was altogether circumstantial, and really there were doubts whether the man was guilty or not. As the judge advocate was not merely a prosecuting officer, but rather a judge, acting as much for the prisoner as the Government, whose duty it was to present the case with all its facts to the Court, I felt that my legal reputation was, in some degree, involved in making this one plain. I made enquiries in all directions into the circumstances. I found a soldier who said that in the evening after the day specified he saw in the prisoners' quarters the half of a dressed pig, about the size and weight of the one missed by Mr. Cozzens. I developed other circumstances, enough to satisfy me that the prisoner had really stolen the pig, but after all there was such want of connection in them, that I doubted whether the evidence was sufficient to satisfy the Court. On the trial, after proving the circumstances of the disappearance of the pig, I called my principal witness, who testified as he said he should. After every effort, without success to get more from him. I asked the prisoner if he had any questions for the witness. In great excitement he said, "Yes, sir, I want to ask him one question. He is de very man who helped me take de pig out of de pen," and had nothing more to offer. I rested the case, as the lawyers say. The Court found him guilty, and he was duly punished. Now in modern times, with all the legal lore and precedents in the Department of Justice, these proceedings would, doubtless, be deemed entirely out of order, the judge advocate and Court be duly reprimanded and the prisoner rewarded. I had other like experiences here and after I joined my regiment, all of which tended to show me that by the Courts Martial of these old times true justice was sooner and better administered than in any civil court in the land. Have we really improved upon them in later years?

On the first of September, 1829, the number of officers here was much increased by details from the class of that year. We soon organized a Literary Society for debates, essays and declamations. We had many able debaters and writers. All took great pains in preparing for their several duties, and our weekly meetings were of great interest and profit. We occasionally had public meetings to which the professors, officers and ladies were invited. At one of these meeting, which at 11 o'clock was adjourned to the next evening and continued till 11 again, the question involved the relative merits of Queen Elizabeth and Mary Queen of Scots, and was debated with marked ability. The argument of Lieut. Tillinghast, then the assistant professor of Ethics, in favor of Queen Elizabeth was said by all to have been the most powerful and eloquent of anything of the kind they had ever heard or read.

About this time too, the great movement, which had for its object by voluntary association and example, to check the growing evil of intemperance in the land, had begun. Though there was little excessive drinking among the officers, it was the general habit to keep, upon the mantle piece, table or side-board, one or two bottles of liquor, of which every visitor, as an act of politeness, was invited to partake; and there were many habitual drunkards among the soldiers and civilian employees at the Post. A number of us joined in the formation of a Temperance Society, pledging ourselves to abstain, for a limited time, from the use of intoxicating drinks, and kindly to exert our influence to induce others to do the same. Foremost in this movement, and in earnest work, was Lieut. Kinsley, instructor of Artillery. The effect of this Society upon the habits of our community was remarkable. Several of our best mechanics and artisans, who had been excessive drinkers, were by its means thoroughly reformed, and to the end of their lives continued industrious, respectable and successful men. I have carefully called to my mind every officer who was a member of it, and can truthfully say, that there is not a single one who while he lived was not, or if living now, is not and has ever been since that time, a strictly temperate man.

During these last three years the hotel was built, mostly from the surplus of the post fund, and Congress becoming more liberal, the present hospital, and quarters of the Chaplain, Professor of Philosophy, French and Spanish.

In the autumn of 1829, Mr. Cozzens announced to us that he could no longer afford to keep up our mess without an increase of price. Many officers rebelled at this and the mess was broken up. As we then had no suitable mess room, many had their meals cooked in the basement of the old South Barracks, and parties of three or four took them in their rooms; others went down to Mrs. Kinsley's to board. Three times a day in all kinds of weather, for over a year, we trudged through the woods to our meals at her house. In September, 1830, the north end of the hospital was opened as quarters for officers. Five of us took our rooms there, much to our rejoicing; a room to each. Two months afterward, a number of us changed our boarding place to the old hospital or Gridley house, which was occupied by a retired English clergyman and family; but this was not much of a success unless perhaps to one, who fell in love and married the daughter. The house was soon turned over as quarters to the fencing master, and a few years after torn down. The house now occupied by Mr. Ward, near the new hospital building, was a part of this hotel. There was no regular mess until the organization of the present one.

During these same three years there were several important changes in the personnel of the Academy. Professor Courtenay, an able and distinguished graduate, had succeeded Professor Mansfield; Professor Mahan had taken the place of Professor Douglass; Captain Hitchcock, who, for my first three years was assistant instructor of Tactics, had relieved Major Worth, and Mr. Molinard, an able teacher of French, had become the second teacher. He is the one who, one day, finding his section much puzzled with the proper use of the partitive articles de and du, said: "Why, gentlemen, this is very easy. I will give you a rule by which you can always tell when to use de and when to use du." Seeing, probably, upon reflection, that it was not quite so easy to put into intelligible shape what came so natural to him, he announced his rule. "Sometimes we use de and sometimes we use du."

In the meantime the Academy was steadily yet silently progressing towards that high standard which Colonel Thayer had set. Those of you who have been able to follow me through the dry detail which I have laid before you, can judge as well as I, whether that standard has been reached, or even passed. Whether it has or not, are there not young officers here present who under the motto "Excelsior" are destined to take an active part in raising it higher and higher yet.
